Mr. SMITH. I want to understand the bearing of the change in this section proposed by the committee. If the writ of habeas corpus is restored to any State, will the Freedmen's Bureau be therefore withdrawn from that State?

Mr. ELIOT. No sir; "within which the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended."

Mr. SMITH. But should the writ of habeas corpus be restored?

Mr. ELIOT. Should the writ of habeas corpus be restored by and by, it would still follow that the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended, and over that section of country the Freedmen's Bureau would still have jurisdiction.

The next amendments are in section five, by inserting before the word "owner" the word "former;" also the same word before the word "owners" in the proviso; also to strike out of the proviso the words "be entitled to" and insert the words "make application for;" also in the same proviso to insert after the words "by rent or purchase" the words "not exceeding forty acres for each occupant."

The section, if so amended, will then read as follows:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant, by the former owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau: Provided, That whenever the former owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall make application for restoration of said lands, the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement, and with the written consent of said occupants, to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, not exceeding forty acres for each occupant, or to set apart for them out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section.

The next amendment is in the seventh section, in the third line, after the word "rebellion," by inserting the words "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended."

The next amendment is in the seventh section, in the eleventh line, after the word "estate," by inserting the words "including the constitutional right to bear arms," so that it will read, "to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, including the constitutional right to bear arms."

The next alteration is in the eighth section, by inserting after the word "rebellion," in the fifth line, the words "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is at present suspended;" and by inserting the same words in the twenty-fourth line after the word "rebellion."

Mr. Speaker, these are the alterations which I am instructed by the committee to make, and it will be observed that the effect of them is to limit the jurisdiction of the bureau, and that it confines it to States within which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is now suspended.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to make one suggestion to the gentleman in reference to his amendment. I suggest to him that he modify the sentence "States in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is now suspended." I suppose that, of course, means at the time of the passage of this bill, and that may be a little indefinite. I suggest to him that he indicate some particular time, say the 1st of January, 1866.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield at present to that suggestion.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, I have the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts to occupy one moment in personal explanation, and I will avail myself of it now.

I was not in the House when the debate on this subject closed on Friday afternoon last, and until I saw the Globe containing the proceedings of that afternoon, I was not aware of some remarks which seem to have been made at that time by my colleague on the other side of the House, [Mr. CHANLER.] I find that while alluding to a letter said to have been written by General Sherman to the President of the United States in regard to his appropriation of certain lands for the use of negroes in the Sea Island plantations, my colleague says:

"That letter should now be before the country, and in the hands of this House. It was in my hands to present to this House, but, owing to the delay consequent on the debate, I withdrew my claim to present it, and it was given to my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] to present to this House."

I know nothing about any such transaction as is there narrated. I knew nothing of any such letter having been placed in the hands of my colleague. I knew nothing of his having had any claim or yielded any claim to present such a letter to the House, and I certainly never for one moment dreamed of being a contestant with him for the presentation of such a letter, or for anything else. And now permit me to say in explanation of my connection with that letter simply this: I was told in conversation with a gentleman from South Carolina, from whom I endeavored to obtain information on this subject, that such a letter had been written, and he showed me the original letter. I asked him if he had any objection to my taking a copy, not for presentation to this House, but for publication in a newspaper with which I happen to be connected, and he assented at once; and it was thus, and for that purpose only, that the letter came into my hands. That is all I wish to say upon that subject.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me for a moment longer, I will avail myself of this opportunity further to say that the general purpose of this bill seems to be one that this Congress has no right to refuse to take some steps to attain. We owe, as a duty to those who have been set free, the protection which this bill affords.

I have no apprehensions as to the practical workings of this law. So far as I have been able to collect information from all quarters—and I have taken some pains to do so—I find that this law, like most other laws on our statute-books, works well where it is well administered. The practical operations of this bureau will depend upon the character of the agents into whose hands its management is intrusted. I certainly have no apprehension in this respect. I do not for one moment fear that the agents who will be appointed to carry this law into execution will not use the powers conferred upon them for the furtherance of the great object which we all have in view—the reconciliation, the protection, the security of all classes of those who are now our fellow-citizens in the southern States.

I believe that the law will be well carried out. I am quite sure that it will work well. I have no apprehension that it will result in the evil consequences so eloquently depicted on Friday last by the gallant gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU.]

I am greatly obliged to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] for the opportunity which he has afforded me to make these remarks.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] allow me to say a few words, in order to set myself right?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir, not now.

Mr. CHANLER. Not for a personal explanation in reference to the matter under debate?

Mr. ELIOT. I decline to yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] I have already agreed to yield a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor, and he declines to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANLER. Now, sir, I appeal to the House. The gentleman refuses to yield to me for a personal explanation in regard to a matter in which I am personally concerned—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is out of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor without interruption.

Mr. ELIOT. I have promised to yield a few moments to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. CHANLER. I object to the gentleman yielding, unless he yields unconditionally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to yield to whom he pleases.

Mr. CHANLER. If the gentleman excludes me from occupying the floor he should exclude others.

The SPEAKER. The rule under which the gentleman from Massachusetts has the right to yield to any member will be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for a personal explanation."

Mr. CHANLER. Well, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the right to yield to the gentleman from New York, or to decline to do so; He declines; and the Chair protects him in his right.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I suggest the following amendment, which I hope will be accepted by the committee on freedmen. I have shown it to all the members of the committee, except perhaps one.

Add at the end of section three the following:

Provided, That no person shall be deemed destitute, suffering, or dependent upon the Government for support, within the meaning of this act, who, being able to find employment, could, by proper industry and exertion, avoid such destitution, suffering, and dependence.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to make a statement. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] I simply desire to say that I never asserted that my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] was under any obligation to present the letter which has been referred to. My knowledge of the facts was limited to his possession of the paper—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is out of order. He must resume his seat, or the Chair will be compelled to enforce the rule. The gentleman has several times appealed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has refused to yield.

Mr. CHANLER. I beg pardon of the Chair. I appealed to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has no right to yield the floor.

Mr. CHANLER. Of course I did not know that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not in order at the present time.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I was in the hope it would be accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection to accept it.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] will withdraw his amendment so as to allow me to submit my substitute.

Mr. DONNELLY. I withdraw my amendment, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has informed me that he has embodied that amendment in the substitute for the whole bill which he is about to offer.

Mr. STEVENS. I now offer a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I think the alterations in the bill made by the substitute can be read by the Clerk in one minute.

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to state them. The first is in section four, line six. I insert the words "and from forfeited estates of the enemy," so that it will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement, under the homestead or preemption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, male or female, unoccupied lands in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and from forfeited estates of the enemy, not exceeding in all three million acres of good land; and the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall cause the same from time to time to be allotted and assigned, in parcels not exceeding forty acres each, to the loyal refugees and freedmen, who shall be protected in the use and enjoyment thereof for such term of time and such annual rent as may be agreed on between the Commissioner and such refugees or freedmen.

The next is to strike out these words:

Based upon a valuation of the land, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, under the direction of the President, by regulation prescribe.

And in lieu thereof to insert, "not to exceed ten cents per acre per annum;" so that it will read:

The rental shall be not to exceed ten cents per acre per annum.

That is to give them homesteads at ten cents per acre instead of at their full value.

The next amendment is to strike out the words "the value of the land as aforesaid," and to insert "not exceeding two dollars per acre;" so it will read:

At the end of such term, or sooner, if the Commissioner shall assent thereto, the occupants of any parcels so assigned, their heirs and assigns, may purchase the land and receive a title thereto from the United States, in fee, upon paying therefor not exceeding two dollars per acre.

Section five is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant, by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau: Provided, That whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order, shall be entitled to restoration of said lands, the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement, and with the written consent of said occupants to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, or to set apart for them, out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill, forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section.

I move to strike out these words, "for the period of three years from the date of said order," and the words "during said three years," and to insert the word "former" before "owner." I may say these lands were given to these people with the understanding they were to possess them until Congress decided the title. The lands are the lands of rebels which were abandoned and seized. This bill authorizes their being turned out at the end of three years, which I wish to avert. To turn them out is an outrage I would never vote for.

Then comes in the amendment of my distinguished friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY:]

After the word "schools," in line seven, section six, insert the following:

And the Commissioner may provide a common-school education for all refugees or freedmen who shall apply therefor.

I move then to strike out of sections seven and eight the words "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." I do that for this reason: although that was put in the constitutional amendment, it does not necessarily come in here. Under the pretense of that very clause they are taking men, as I have authentic information, for assault and battery and selling them into bondage for ninety-nine years.

Mr. Speaker, I would now suggest that we devote this evening to discussion of this bill. We can call the previous question and take the vote in the morning. I ask the gentleman to let me offer a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. ELIOT. I want to take the vote now.

Mr. STEVENS. That is intended to keep debate up if the previous question is not called to-day. This evening let it be understood that the discussion be on this bill; after that on the President's message.

Mr. ELIOT. It seems to me we had better finish this bill and take a vote on it now.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania requires unanimous consent.

Mr. ELIOT. I object to it. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. About twenty-eight minutes.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not propose to occupy the time of this House in protracted discussion of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been accepted by him or is in any shape pending before the House.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir, it has not been and could not be.

The SPEAKER. It is pending as amendment to the substitute offered by the committee, and the first question will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. LE BLOND. Will it be in a position to be voted for?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. It will be reported before it is voted upon.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the attention of the House very briefly in closing the debate upon this bill, and possibly might refrain from speaking but that I wish to bring to the notice of the House a few facts from official sources concerning the operation and the value of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Three objections have been urged against this bill. Two gentlemen, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. TAYLOR,] of New York, and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. PHELPS,] very frankly admit that we are called on for some legislation to protect the freedmen who have been, by military emancipation and by constitutional amendment, brought under the guardian care of the Government, but they contend that the provisions of this bill are not such as commend themselves to their judgment. All the other gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House deprecate all legislation and deny that any bill, however drawn, having the objects in view sought to be effected can properly receive support. We see these millions of men overwhelmed in the rough seas, but we must not stretch forth the wand of the law to part the waters for their salvation.

Mr. PHELPS. As the gentleman has alluded to me, I would like to state just here, that in view of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] which has been accepted, as I understand it, I withdraw my objection to the bill, the principle of which, as I said before, I indorse, only objecting to matters of detail. I shall therefore vote for the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PHELPS] to withdraw his objection to the bill, and shall certainly be glad to have his vote given in its behalf.

The first objection made to this legislation is that this whole bill, in its object, scope, purposes, and provisions, is in contravention of the Constitution. This would be a marvelous misfortune, if true, and would prove that our Constitution, ordained to promote the general welfare and to secure the blessings of liberty, had not within itself the power to do its work. It has not hitherto performed its full work, we know. When slavery lived, and within nearly one half of our Republic laws were in force which permitted and encouraged human bondage, the people could not be secured in the enjoyment of these blessings. There is not, however, any provision in the Constitution which in specific words empowers us to pass this law, and there are some gentlemen who seem to require such specific grant of power before they can consent to act in this direction. But to those not unwilling to discern it the power to act is obvious enough.

No one will deny, at this time, the military power of the Commander-in-Chief to declare freedom when Mr. Lincoln acted. But no express grant of power to that effect can be found in the Constitution. We were in war. The institution of slavery was used as an instrumentality of war, powerful, effective, and controlling. Without it the rebel States would not have gone to war, and could not have conducted it. It was the back-ground of their strength. It supplied them with food and dug them intrenchments and supported them at home and in the field. It would have been madness in us and great folly not to have taken from them this strength. But more than that. The men who were made to work against us were our friends—the only friends we had in all the rebel States—ignorant it may be, degraded by slavery, but still our friends.

The President then, Mr. Speaker, had as Commander-in-Chief the power—no matter now about the right, the justice, as Mr. Lincoln said, but the power—to liberate the slave. By all the laws of war, since war was first waged, where slaves were held by either contending party, he had the power. Under the Constitution Congress had used its powers to raise and support armies, to make rules for the government of our forces, to provide for the suppression of the insurrection. All the war powers in the President were in force, and that was one of them. The freedmen were cast by that act upon our Government in a time of war. But the power to free them involved the duty to protect them, and for that protection Congress must provide, and every provision in this bill if fairly called for in order to protect them is thus justified. I read that Constitution with other eyes than those which look at it from the stand-point of the master. By that military emancipation they were made free; but in Kentucky, Delaware, Missouri, and Maryland, the Commander-in-Chief did not free them, nor in all of Louisiana or in Tennessee. Missouri and Maryland acted themselves. But in Kentucky and Delaware the chains were shackled fast until the amendment of our Constitution declaring all men free was ratified. And the second section of that amendment confers the power and so creates the duty for just such legislation as this bill contains, to give them shelter, and food, to lift them from slavery into the manhood of freedom, to clothe the nakedness of the slave, and to educate him into that manhood that shall be of value to the State.

The objection to this bill because of the fact that it left the whole country to be districted has been removed by the amendment which the committee have authorized me to report.

The objection which was urged last night, because of the expense which this bureau would create, is removed materially by the amount which the committee, on the part of the House, in the first and also in the present substitute have reported.

The argument on this point which was made by the gentleman from Kentucky was upon the bill as it came from the Senate; it was not upon the substitute which had been offered to the House by this committee.

The salaries which were discussed were those named in that bill and not in this.

The number of clerks objected to was the number provided for in the Senate bill and not in this.

By the terms of this bill gentlemen all understand that officers of the Army, or enlisted men, so far as their services can be procured, will be detailed for service here.

The expense as I believe, and as the friends of this measure who have examined this subject most carefully believe, will be fully borne, fully met, if only the bureau can have a fair chance, and the freedmen who are cared for by it can have an opportunity to make their labor remunerative.

But the gentlemen from Kentucky have said that this bureau is not wanted anywhere, especially is not wanted there. And my purpose as much as anything else in asking the attention of the House now, was to lay before it the official evidence that I have here upon that subject.

First, I will read an extract from a report of General Howard, the brother of the Commissioner, concerning the white refugees. He says:

"At Atlanta, there was more of an accumulation of destitute freed people than I had seen elsewhere. The armies had more completely devastated all the country around. Many whites, at least three hundred families, as estimated by the sub-assistant commissioner, will suffer greatly this winter unless relieved by Government agency. The bureau officer had assisted some of these destitute refugees by transportation and rations. He was endeavoring to find places for the able-bodied colored people, and had already considerably diminished the numbers. By the help of the assistant commissioner of the State, he will be able to apprentice most of the homeless children. Many cases of violence to negroes in that section are reported to him, but his district is so large that he cannot, he says, rectify these evils except in comparatively few cases. Several good schools and a hospital are in successful operation at Atlanta; the former, as at Macon, being chiefly sustained by the benevolent associations of the North."

Concerning Florida, General Howard says:

"From conversation with Lieutenant Colonel Apthorpe, one of Colonel Osborn's inspectors, as well as from the other sources of information mentioned, [conversations with citizens of Tallahassee and vicinity and with Generals Foster and Newton,] I became convinced that there were rather more exceptions in Florida to the general rule, prevalent in southern Georgia, of prejudice and unjust dealing against the freedmen, but that still with the majority of the people there was the same unwillingness or moral incapacity to treat them with fairness and as freemen."

"I was informed by a high military official that since the hanging of a citizen for murder at Tallahassee, convicted by a military court, and the pending trial of another for shooting a negro, he had received letters from parties declaring they would not live in a country where a man must be hung for resenting an insult with arms, and where a man must be tried for his life for shooting a 'nigger.' He informed me also that certain of these parties had carried out their threat of leaving the State, and had gone to Texas to reside."

"From the same official I was gratified to learn as a testimonial to the good discipline of some of the colored troops and as an offset to the complaints against them in southern Georgia, that all the principal citizens of Jasper, Florida, petitioned for the return of a company of colored troops which had been ordered away from there. The constant quarreling between discharged Union and rebel soldiers resident there rendered the presence of troops necessary. The colored troops were put back to continue garrisoning the place."

"There is the same disposition to depreciate wages in Florida as in Georgia."

Concerning the necessity laid upon this bureau to provide for medical treatment of freedmen, I would state that from reports made to Surgeon Horner, medical chief of the bureau, it appears that—

"A majority of the physicians of the district (Virginia) refuse to render any services to these people unless compensated in advance."

"A much larger number of freedmen would be able, even in their present condition, to provide for their own medical care were it not for the system of charges for medical services and medicines through the State (Virginia) is at such a high rate. Few physicians, comparatively, as yet make the proper distinctions in favor of this class of persons, and still continue to demand payment in advance for all services rendered. Five dollars a visit, even for short distances, is no unusual charge, and an equally high rate for medicines."

"It is apparent that very few of the large number of freedmen find it possible in their present transition state to pay these rates, although in the larger places some have succeeded in so doing, and the number is increasing."

From North Carolina:

"A colored clergyman of Raleigh reported to Colonel E. Whittlesey, forty-sixth United States colored troops, that he was unable to obtain a physician to attend his sick family, and that a combination exists among the local physicians not to give medical attendance to colored people."

From Georgia Surgeon Lawton writes:

"I was there (at Macon) last week; saw the mayor and told him the Government did not intend to relieve local (civil) authorities of the care of the sick and infirm in the city. He said that the negro population was estimated at from eight to ten thousand in and around the city, gathered from all the neighboring counties, and the city was poor; could not, would not take care of them. Underneath the professed loyalty and Union sentiment of this State (Georgia) lies a deep, bitter feeling of hatred and animosity; years may soften it, but for the present all this feeling will crop out, as it does constantly, in acts of cruelty toward the negro. The hate toward the northerners spends itself in that direction. I could spend the day in relating such acts.

In Atlanta, I know from personal inspection that multitudes of the feeble and women and children are living either in the open air, or such rude shelters of brush and logs and old tin from car roofs as they can construct, exposed to storms and cold, and such a life induces a large amount of sickness and a high rate of mortality.

I returned yesterday (January 26, 1866), from a tour of inspection of two weeks over the State. The demand increases, or else a knowledge of the needs of the freedmen grows upon me for help. Small-pox spreads with terrible rapidity and fatality, and generally civil authorities show a cruel heartlessness and wicked indifference to their wants which does little credit to their humanity."

From Texas the surgeon in charge writes that—

"Captain W. D. Wardlow, recently ordered to Homer, Angelina county, with two companies of the twelfth Illinois cavalry, reported his intention to arrest a planter named Herman Brown for killing a freedman. It is stated and corroborated by the evidence of the dying man that Brown had in his service the freedman's wife and denied him the right to see her, threatening to shoot him if he came again, which threat Brown carried out. Captain Wardlow says it is currently rumored that there is an organization with some of the planters to kill every freedman that leaves his former master. In San Augustine county a planter named Gadden informed his employes that they were not free until Christmas, and compelled them to stay."

I now, Mr. Speaker, read to you an extract from the report from Kentucky of Brevet Major General Fisk, assistant commissioner for Kentucky and Tennessee:

BUREAU FREEDMEN, REFUGEES,
STATES OF KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE,
ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, January 23, 1866.

GENERAL: I assure you that in no portion of the country is the bureau a more positive necessity than in many counties of Kentucky, and for the sake of the nation's plighted faith to her wards, the freedmen, and in behalf of humanity and justice, I implore you and the President to listen to no request for its withdrawal from the State until the civil authorities, in the enforcement of impartial laws, shall amply protect the persons and property of those for whose protection and defense this bureau is set.

I saw with my own eyes our fellow-soldiers, yet clad in the uniform of their country's Army, fresh from their muster out of service, who, within the last ten days, were the victims of fiendish atrocity from the hands of their former masters in Kentucky. These returned soldiers had been to their old homes for their wives and children, and had for this offense been knocked down, whipped, and horribly bruised, and threatened with shooting should they ever dare set their feet on the premises of their old master again and intimate that their families were free.

On the very day last week that Garret Davis was engaged in denouncing the Freedmen's Bureau in the United States Senate, his own neighbors, who had fought gallantly in the Union Army, were pleading with myself for the protection which the civil authorities failed to afford. The civil law prohibits the colored man from bearing arms; returned soldiers are, by the civil officers, dispossessed of their arms and fined for violation of the law.

I inclose herewith copies of two letters received from Meade county. Mr. Stewart is circuit judge. It would, I fear, do great harm were the bureau to be withdrawn from any portion of the county where slavery has ceased to exist as the result of the war, until the people shall have had ample time, under the guardianship of the Government, to adjust their new relations on the basis of impartial justice to all men.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CLINTON B. FISK,

Brevet Major General, Assistant Commissioner.
Major General HOWARD, Commissioner, &c.

The letters referred to by General Fisk are as follows. The first is dated—

BRANDENBURGH, KENTUCKY, December 29, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the freedmen of this county have been grossly imposed on by former rebel owners. Whether they are rebels at present is for you to judge upon the information given me by the freedmen.

I will state one circumstance given me by Mr. H. Patterson, a member of company K, one hundred and eighteenth United States colored infantry. He was honorably discharged the service on the 15th day of September, 1865. He came to this place and sent to the county for his wife and children. Their former owner, Shacklett, of rebel notoriety, refused to give them up to their father and husband, and notifies the soldier if he comes on his lands for the purpose of getting them he will shoot him. He has not got them yet. Please inform me what course should be pursued in regard to the freedmen. We have no agent for the Freedmen's Bureau at this place. The disposition of the would-be rebels is to persecute the freedmen to the utmost extent.

Sir, another thing I wish to call your attention to is the oppression of returned Union soldiers. On the 18th of December, 1865, a Union soldier, formerly of the seventeenth Kentucky cavalry, came to this place and was grossly beaten by a former rebel soldier, guerrilla, and his friends—reasons, that he had sent negroes across the Ohio river. He was beaten for obeying an order issued by you to his officer and by his captain to him. The civil authorities have taken no notice of the disgraceful riot on the Sabbath, and such things have occurred on several occasions. The civil law here is in the hands of the rebels.

For character I refer you to Colonel E. W. Crittenden, United States Army, and Colonel James T. Bramlette, inspector general of Kentucky.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. F. DENTON,
Formerly Lieutenant Twelfth Kentucky Cavalry.
Major General PALMER.

Now, sir, I give an extract from the letter of Judge Stewart, dated at Brandenburg, January 4, 1866:

General Fisk: * * * * There is a place about nine miles from this called Meadeville, formerly a guerrilla headquarters. At that place there has been a reign of terror for two weeks. The pretense of the rascals concerned in it is to expel all the freedmen.

They have made the declaration that no one shall hire a negro, not even the former owners of them.

One man's houses were burned some days ago on the faith of a rumor that he was about to hire his former slaves and put them there to live.

The family of a certain John Blunt Shacklett, together with a Jesse Murray Shacklett and Bill Shacklett—they attempted to carry out their purpose here day before yesterday. They with cocked pistols paraded several negroes about the street, and went in search of some who had been in the Army, and would undoubtedly have killed them if they had been found. Some of us (very few) went into business about this point, and they were soon cleaned out, two being badly wounded.

I learn that yesterday they were assembled in force at Meadeville; no process of law can be served upon them. Now what are we to do? I cannot undertake the business, for I have been thumped to death nearly heretofore.

Please inform me what may be looked for at once. Obediently, &c.

J. STEWART.

I just hear that yesterday at Meadeville, a certain Mayor Harrison proclaimed that any one who hired a negro deserved to hang, and should be hung.

This is a law they had charged as a spy, and I unfortunately lent a hand in getting him clear. It is certain he went to pilot Berry and his gang through here last fall, and ought to be had up for that.

MR. SMITH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] allow me to say a word in reference to General Fisk?

MR. ELIOT. I am sorry to be compelled to decline.

MR. SMITH. I desire to say but a word in reference to a speech made by General Fisk, in Cincinnati, in reference to Kentucky.

MR. ELIOT. I must decline to yield.

MR. HARDING, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] allow me to ask him a question? By whom is that report signed? Is it signed by General Fisk or some subordinate?

MR. ELIOT. It is an official report by General Fisk.

MR. HARDING, of Kentucky. Is it signed by General Fisk or by a subordinate?

MR. ELIOT. It is signed by General Fisk.

MR. HARDING, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

MR. ELIOT. What I have had read is a certified copy of a report made and signed by General Fisk, as the gentleman will see by examining the copy just read by the Clerk.

MR. GRIDER. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] when he obtained the communication just read.

MR. ELIOT. My impression is that I have had the report of General Fisk for about a week. The two letters accompanying it I have procured since.

From the report of Colonel Whittlesey, assistant commissioner of North Carolina, I present the following extract:

"The method pursued may be best presented by citing a few cases, and the action thereon. From the report of Captain James, for August, I quote the following:

"I forwarded you, in his own language, a report of a case which occurred in Gates county, on the northern border of the State, far away from any influence of troops, and where the military power of the Government had been little felt. No doubt it illustrates others in similar localities far from garrisons and northern influences. The report will repay perusal, and appears to have been managed with admirable tact on the part of Captain Hill. Reports had reached me of the way in which David Parker, of Gates county, treated his colored people, and I determined to ascertain for myself their truth. Accordingly last Monday, August 20, accompanied by a guard of six men from this post, (Elizabeth City,) I proceeded to his residence, about forty miles distant. He is very wealthy. I ascertained, after due investigation, and after convincing his colored people that I was really their friend, that the worst reports of him were true. He had twenty-three negroes on his farm, large and small. Of these fourteen were field hands. They all bore unmistakable evidence of the way they had been worked. Very much undersized, rarely exceeding man or woman, four feet six inches. Men and women of thirty and forty years of age looking like boys and girls. It has been his habit for years to work them from sunrise to sunset, and often long after, only stopping one hour for dinner—food always cooked for them to save time. He had and has had for many years an old colored man, one-eyed, and worn out in the service, for an overseer or 'over-looker,' as he called himself. In addition, he has two sons at home, one of whom has made it a point to be with them all summer long—not so much to superintend as to drive. The old colored overseer always went behind the gang with a cane or whip, and woe betide the unlucky wretch who did not do continually his part. He had been brought up to work, and had not the least pity for any one who could not work as well as he.

Mr. Parker told me that he had hired his people for the season; that directly after the surrender of General Lee he called them up, told them they were free, that he was better used to them than to others, and would prefer hiring them, that he would give them board and two suits of clothing to stay with him till the last day of January, 1866, and one Sunday suit at the end of that time, that they consented willingly—in fact preferred to remain with him, &c. But from his people I learned that though he did call them up, as stated, yet when one of them demurred at the offer, his son James flew at him and cuffed and kicked him; that after that, they were all perfectly willing to stay; they were watched night and day; that Bob, one of the men, had been chained nights, that they were actually afraid to try to get away. There was no complaint of the food, nor much of the clothing; but they were in constant terror of the whip. Only three days before my arrival Bob had been stripped in the field and given fifty lashes, for hitting Adam, the colored over-looker, while James Parker stood by with a gun, and told him to run if he wanted to, he had a gun there. About four weeks before, four of them who went to church and returned before sunset, were treated to twenty-five lashes each. Some were beaten or whipped almost every day. Having ascertained these and other similar facts, I directed him to call them up and pay them from the 1st of May last up to the present time. I investigated each case, taking into consideration age, family, physical condition, &c., estimating their work from eight dollars down, and saw him pay them off then and there, allowing for clothing and medical bill. I then arrested him and his two sons, and brought them here, except Dr. Joseph Parker, whose sister is very sick, with all the colored people I thought necessary as witnesses, intending to send them to Newbern for trial. But on account of the want of immediate transportation I concluded to release them by their giving a bond in the sum of $2,000 to Colonel E. Whittlesey, assistant commissioner for the State of North Carolina, and to his successors in office, conditional as follows:

"That whereas David Parker and James Parker have heretofore maltreated their colored people, and have enforced the compulsory system instead of the free-labor system, now, therefore, if they, each of them, shall hereafter well and kindly treat, and cause to be treated, the hired laborers under their or his charge, and shall adopt the free-labor system in lieu of the compulsory system, then this bond to be void and of no effect, otherwise to remain in full force and effect, with good security."

Lieutenant Colonel Clapp, superintendent central district, reports three cases of cruel beating, which have been investigated, and the offenders turned over to the military authorities for trial; besides very many instances of defrauding freedmen of their wages.

From the reports of Major Wickersham, superintendent of the southern district, I quote the following:

"August 25, A. S. Miller, Bladen county, states that Henry Miller (colored) neglects to support his family. Action, required Henry Miller to use his wages for the support of his wife and children who have no claims on their former master, and can look to no one else than the husband and father for support."

"27. Betsey Powell (colored) states that Mrs. Frank Powell, Columbus county, has driven her away without pay for her labor. Gave letter to Mrs. Powell directing her to pay Betsey for her labor since April 27, 1865."

"29. Len Shiner (colored) states that he made an agreement with Mr. David Russell, of Robeson county, to work and gather his crop, for which he was to receive subsistence and one third of the crop when gathered. Mr. Russell has driven him off and refuses to pay. Wrote to Mr. Russell directing him to comply with terms of agreement, or furnish satisfactory reasons for not doing so. These are but examples of hundreds of complaints heard and acted upon by Major Wickersham and other officers in the southern district."

"The following cases are taken from the report of Captain Barritt, assistant commissioner at Charlotte. Morrison Miller, charged with whipping girl Hannah, (colored.) Found guilty. Action—ordered to pay said Hannah fifty bushels of corn toward supporting herself and children, two of said children being the offspring of Miller."

"William Wallace, charged with whipping Martha, (colored.) Plead guilty. Action—fined said Wallace fifteen dollars, with assurance that if the above of fence was repeated the fine would be doubled."

"Council Best attempts to defraud six families of their summer labor, by offering to sell at auction the crop on his leased plantation. Action—sent military force and stopped the sale until contract with laborers was complied with."

"A hundred pages of similar reports might be copied, showing, on the one side, that many freedmen need the presence of some authority to enforce upon them their new duties, and on the other, that so far from being true that "there is no county in which a freedman can be imposed upon," (speech of Judge Reed in constitutional convention,) there is no county in which he is not oftener wronged, and these wrongs increase in proportion to their distance from United States authorities. There has been great improvement during the quarter, in this respect. The efforts of the bureau to protect the freedmen have done much to restrain violence and injustice. Such efforts must be continued until civil government is fully restored, just laws enacted, or great suffering and serious disturbance will be the result.

General C. W. Howard, as the result of his inspection, submits these considerations in his report:

"I. Agencies of the United States Government of some sort, similar to the existing bureau agencies, are for the present indispensable in every part of the two States visited.

"1. Great suffering and starvation would ensue among the refugees and freedmen in some sections were all Government aid withdrawn.

"2. Public sentiment is such that even should the laws be made impartial the negro could not obtain redress for wrongs done him in person or property.

"3. There seems to be a moral incapacity with the majority of white residents to treat him fairly in the ordinary transactions of business as, e. g., in making contracts. His own inexperience in such things therefore renders necessary some agency to guard his interests.

"4. Existing theories concerning the education of laborers and the prejudices against the blacks, are such as absolutely to prevent the establishment of schools for the freedmen, even though the expenses were paid by the benevolent associations of the North, and the many successful schools now in operation would be broken up in most places on the withdrawal of the Government agencies.

"The same general observation will apply to all missionary work by northern agents, and from special inquiry and investigation of this subject I am convinced that very little in the way of moral and religious instruction for the freed people is to be expected at present from the members and ministers of the southern churches.

"II. On the other hand, it is for the interest of the whites for these agencies to remain, and the better class of the thinking men expressed themselves unhesitatingly in favor of it.

"1. The prevailing want of confidence on the part of the freedmen in those who have been slaveholders makes it necessary to have a third party (and a United States official is better than any other) to induce the freedmen to enter into contracts. Many of the white residents told me that no contracts would have been effected but for the bureau officers.

"2. Such agents are needed often to secure the fulfillment of contracts on the part of the freedmen both in the explaining the exact meaning and force of the contract and enforcing it by different motives and means.

"3. For the protection of the whites against any hostile combinations of the blacks. This will be needed as long as the present public sentiment of the whites continues, insuring a corresponding distrust and hostility on the part of the blacks.

"Our agents have done much to allay such ill-feeling," &c.

Mr. Speaker, in order to show somewhat the existing feeling in some portions of Maryland, I annex a letter recently written by a teacher of a freedmen's school:

To the Attorney of the Baltimore Association for the Moral and Educational Improvement of the Colored People:

HAGERSTOWN, MARYLAND, February 1, 1865.

DEAR SIR: The rebels have come out against me at last. Last week I was informed by the deputy sheriff that a gang of them were organized for the purpose of breaking up the school and blacking the teacher. Both the mayor and sheriff have warned the colored people to go armed to school, (which they do,) and if they attempt it to shoot as many as possible. On Monday night the deputy sheriff staid with us at the school. On the same night the rebels laid a trap for me, which I walked into, but got out again. I called into a colored church, as I was accustomed to do after school, when I discovered about twelve whites near the door, who, upon my entrance, locked the door and took possession of the key. They then commenced a row with the colored people. In the yard the fight became general. The whites swore vengeance on the colored people and the school. After I left they convoked again, and shots were fired. One of the colored men, thinking they had got me, ran to the jail for assistance, and was returning, and was on his own doorstep, when he was shot by a fellow near by, who, I believe, mistook him for me. The next night the school was very thin, owing to the fright, but about twenty returned colored soldiers came in and staid all the evening, all armed. The superintendent of schools came down and brought me a revolver. If they attack the school again I think they will get worsted.

Yours, very respectfully, G. A. TUCKER.

Rev. F. ISRAEL.

I now close by reading the last petition which I have received from Indiana:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The executive committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends for the relief of Freedmen have examined Major General O. O. Howard's report. We know the condition of the freedmen and their wants, and we believe that the honor and faith of the nation are pledged to their relief; and we pray that such action be had as to extend the powers of the bureau, and continue it until its legitimate work is accomplished.

On behalf of the committee,

TIMOTHY HARRISON,

Secretary.

RICHMOND, First month 30, 1865.

Mr. Speaker, I wish now to modify the amendment in the first section so that it will read "in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1865;" and I wish the same amendment made wherever in the bill the same words occur.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman if his time has expired.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman intend to occupy that time?

Mr. ELIOT. No; I will yield it to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had a little more time to explain the amendment which I have offered, for it is important in two or three particulars.

The bill as it now stands contemplates turning off the freedmen from the homesteads which were allotted to them by order of the Government, in three years.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STEVENS. I have moved to strike out all that it says about three years, and about their possession being confirmed until a satisfactory arrangement between them and the former owners of the land. That is the first and most material amendment.

The bill provides that lands shall be rented to them at a price which they brought as a rental before the war upon a valuation. What boon is that to a freedman? It also provides that they acquire title to the public lands of the Government at a price not less than their valuation. What advantage is that to them? There are no public lands in these States except the everglades which are referred to. I have provided in my amendment that they may acquire title to the public lands and the confiscated lands of the enemy, so as to give them an opportunity to settle upon both.

I have also proposed to strike out the words "unless convicted of crime," &c., in that clause. I know that men are convicted of assault and battery and sentenced to slavery down there. I have authentic evidence of that fact in several letters, and therefore I propose to strike out those words.

Now, sir, if I had time, I could show the House that these freedmen have a right under our laws to the confiscated lands to the amount of forty acres each, on the lands where they are, assigned to them by the Government, under Order No. 11, that they should have them for homesteads.

I would like also to have time to show how much land we have there. We have lands there to the extent of more than one hundred thousand acres, and of more than one hundred million dollars in value. And yet, notwithstanding this, the freedmen have been and are being driven from lands which have been ordered to be confiscated as enemy's property, and which are covered over now with freedmen and villages, school-houses and churches, which they have built. Why, sir, General Fisk told me that within the last four weeks he had been compelled reluctantly to return twenty-two million dollars' worth of property in his district, which had been confiscated and was in the possession of the United States Government.

And I would also like to show, if I had time, that the Government has no such power. The pardoning power does not give it any such power. No power but the power of Congress can reach it, so that these lands can be returned to their former owners.

I should like also to show that the freedmen on the Sea Islands, who have gone there upon the faith of these forty-acre grants, and have built for themselves comfortable houses and established communities there, have the right to retain those lands forever; and that it is a burning cruelty in us, by a provision of this kind, to allow them to be turned off in three years.

I should like also to show, as I can show, that there are sixteen thousand freedmen on the Peninsula between Fortress Monroe and Williamsburg, occupying lands seized by the Government, and which has become the property of the United States under our confiscation act—taken not as the property of traitors, but as enemy's property, and confiscated as the property of belligerents, not to be reached by any pardon on earth except the pardon of this Congress. Those sixteen thousand freedmen who are there in communities, who have built their houses, their churches, their school-houses, and who have over two hundred thousand dollars in savings banks, now receive notice to turn out, and reeking rebels are to be brought back and take their places, under the pretense that a pardon can restore to them lands which belonged to us and which we have given to these freedmen. God forbid that I should ever vote for such a bill as that.

Why, sir, as my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] said, when that wise man the Emperor of Russia set free twenty-two million serfs, he compelled their masters to give them homesteads upon the very soil which they had tilled; homesteads not at a full price, but at a nominal price; "for," said he, in noble words, "they have earned this, they have worked upon the land for ages, and they are entitled to it." But, by this bill, we propose to sell our land at not less than the Government price, or to rent it at prices which these poor people can never pay. If this bill shall go into operation, that will be its effect.

Mr. ELIOT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say that so far from that being the case, I have information from the head of this bureau that under the provisions of this bill all the rights of these colored men can be cared for with entire satisfaction to them; that it is all they ask, and all they want.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me read the language of the bill:

That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant, by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

What does that mean?

Mr. ELIOT. Why does not the gentleman read the rest of the section? It continues thus:

Provided, That whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall be entitled to restoration of said lands the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement, and with the written consent of said occupants, to procure other lands for them, by rent or purchase, or to set apart for them out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill, forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section.

Mr. STEVENS. Does that prevent the occupants from being turned out?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think so; and I say that this bill is a robbery.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ELIOT. Before the vote be taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, I wish to say that I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out in the seventh and eighth sections the words "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Mr. SMITH. I ask the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection to its presentation.

Mr. STEVENS. Is such an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is. Both substitutes propose to strike out the entire Senate bill. It is in order to perfect the Senate bill before striking it out.

Mr. SMITH. I move to amend the Senate bill by adding at the end of the last section the following words:

Provided, That none of the provisions of this act shall extend to, or be enforced in, the State of Kentucky.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the question.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] to perfect the original Senate bill, moves to amend it by exempting the State of Kentucky from its operation. The gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the select committee on freedmen, moves to amend the Senate bill by striking it all out and inserting a substitute which will be reported before the vote is taken. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] moves to amend the substitute by striking it all out and inserting another substitute. The first question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, to perfect the original bill. The next question will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The next question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who proposes a substitute for the Senate bill. If that should prevail, the question will then be upon ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. SMITH. I call the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, as it will be necessary to take votes on three or four different propositions before the bill can be disposed of, and as that will detain us to six o'clock, we allow the bill to go over until the morning.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not object, if that be the wish of the House.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That on and after this day, until otherwise ordered, the House will take a recess daily at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., to meet again at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., for debate only in the Committee of the Whole on the President's message.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

On motion by Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 36, to quiet doubts in relation to the validity of certain locations of land in the State of Missouri, made by virtue of certificates issued under act of Congress of February 17, 1815, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The hour of half-past four o'clock p. m. having arrived, the Speaker stated that the House, under an order recently adopted, would take a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., (Mr. HIGBY in the Chair as Speaker pro tempore), and resumed, as in the Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio, was entitled to the floor.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, history is said to be philosophy teaching by example. In the annals of the human race the past five years of our own country will contain greater and sublimer lessons for the instruction of mankind than will be found in any other period of the same duration since the time when history commenced its record. In martial prowess and military achievements the great wars of Napoleon, commencing with his Italian campaign in 1796, and continuing down to the battle of Waterloo, in 1815, which terminated the career of that wonderful man, who shook the earth as with the "throes of an earthquake," bore no comparison with those of our own country in the recent rebellion. In this war, dark, bloody, and fratricidal, countless millions of treasure and thousands of the most valuable lives, mostly among the middle-aged and young, have been cruelly and wantonly sacrificed. Surely our losses have been great, but how incalculably greater have been our compensations. For every sorrow there is a consolation, and for every grief there is a joy. As at Marathon, Yorktown, and Waterloo, in this terrible conflict of arms, the cause of justice, humanity, and liberty has been successful. In this sea of blood, wantonly shed, from the nation's escutcheon the dark stain of slavery has been washed away forever. A race of four million people, downtrodden and oppressed, the victims of the most unrelenting despotism, have been made free and restored to the rights of manhood. Upon the accession to the Presidency of the late President Lincoln there was no disposition on the part of any considerable portion of those mainly instrumental in his election to interfere with the peculiar institution in the States where it existed. Their only purpose was to arrest its further extension; and but for the rebellion this institution might have continued for a hundred years, or for an indefinite period of time. In all human probability, within the short period of fifty years the aggregate amount of human happiness will be much greater than it would have been if the war had not occurred. Indeed, mysterious and past-finding out are the ways of Providence. In the face of rapine, murder, and civil war, we dare not approve the events through which our country has just passed. In the face of emancipation and universal freedom to all men and all races we dare not condemn. So interwoven are the providences of God in the affairs of men that there are actions in human conduct of which human tribunals are incompetent to judge. When we look back at the condition of those before the war whose wicked counsel originated and whose mad ambition led the people of the so-called confederate States into the whirlpool of rebellion and civil war, and when we reflect how frantic with fury and madness they were, both those who led and those who followed, we can only account for their strange and suicidal conduct upon the supposition that communities and nations, like individuals, have their paroxysms of passion and insanity. How terrible have been their sufferings, how unprovoked was the rebellion, and how awfully sublime has been the retribution!

Prior to the war, for thirty years, with the exception of short intervals, the political power of the Government was controlled by that section that attempted to establish the so-called "confederate States of America." The leaders of the rebellion were the great barons and constituted the aristocracy of our country. They monopolized in the Senate, in the Cabinet, and in the field every place of honor and emolument. In all sectional and political controversies they were successful. Their treason, in the vain attempt to destroy our Government, has converted their opulence into poverty; their States have been desolated by war; their families and kindred have been slain in battle, and the peculiar institution whose area and power it was their purpose to enlarge and strengthen has been utterly and forever destroyed. Executive clemency alone can save them from exile, the prison, and the scaffold. In view of their treason and horrid crimes, who can say that this terrible retribution is not just, or that this punishment is not merited?

In the treatment of a conquered enemy or a fallen foe, sound philosophy and the principles of the Christian religion alike inculcate magnanimity as a duty on the part of the victors as well as a cardinal virtue.

Mr. Chairman, I now proceed to the discussion of the subject more immediately under consideration. The discussion of the President's message has assumed a wide range. It is impossible that it should have been otherwise; for the message embraces subjects the most momentous that ever occupied the thoughts of a deliberative body of men.

While the policy of the Administration in its efforts to reorganize civil Governments in the so-called "confederate States of America" is indorsed by the country, and cordially and earnestly approved by the loyal Union men, there are those who misapprehend, in my judgment, its principles and doubt its wisdom.

Mr. Chairman, we are now enjoying the light of what may be considered the bright day of the Republic; the military power of the rebellion has been broken; the resources of the confederate States have been exhausted; among the masses the spirit of insurrection has been subdued, and the leaders are either in exile or captivity or at the feet of the Executive, supplicants for mercy.

That we may the better understand the path of duty, as well as the policy, justice, and wisdom may indicate, it might not be unprofitable for us to go back in our history to what may be considered the dark day of the Republic. On the first Monday of December, 1863, the Thirty-Eighth Congress convened in this Capitol. Upon its immediate organization a powerful minority party appeared in the House of Representatives hostile to the national Administration, more or less in sympathy with the rebellion, and representing a constituency extending throughout the loyal States with sentiments and views in harmony with their own. Every measure proposed by the Administration party to strengthen the financial or military condition of the country was denounced and assailed by this party as unconstitutional and oppressive. The rebels, elated by their victories, were confident of success, and everywhere the war for the preservation of the Union and the suppression of the rebellion was pronounced a failure. The perils of our situation were greatly enhanced by differences of opinion among Union men upon the presidential question. In the then alarming and perilous condition of the country President Lincoln, on the 8th day of December of that year, issued his proclamation of amnesty and pardon, and proposed his plan for the reconstruction of order and civil government in the rebel States. The purpose of the President in his proffered pardon was to weaken the power of the rebellion by inducing the insurgents to abandon the bogus government of the so-called "southern confederacy" and return to their proper allegiance to the Government. Good faith on the part of those in authority, and especially the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, is always required. This proclamation of proffered mercy was unrescinded and in full force on the 14th of April, 1865, the day of his assassination.

I now propose to call the attention of the committee to some of the principal features of the amnesty proclamation of President Lincoln. The preamble recites the provision of the Constitution of the United States declaring that the President "shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment," makes a brief allusion to the laws of Congress, "declaring forfeitures and confiscation of property and liberation of slaves, all upon terms and conditions therein stated, and also declaring that the President was thereby authorized at any time thereafter by proclamation to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such times, and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare." The preamble then concludes with this important avowal:

"Whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States and reorganize loyal State governments within and for their respective States."

By reference to this part of the preamble it is plain to be seen that the President had in view two objects to accomplish: first, to weaken the rebellion by proffering amnesty and pardon to those who desired to resume their allegiance to the United States; and second, to "reinaugurate loyal State governments."

I will now, Mr. Chairman, by the indulgence of the committee, read those parts of the proclamation I deem the most essential to a proper understanding of its import and purpose:

"I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have directly, or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in proper cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain such oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I do solemnly swear, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder; and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by the decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God."

The persons excepted from the benefits of the foregoing provisions are:

"1. All who are, or shall have been, pretended civil or diplomatic officers or otherwise, or domestic or foreign agents of the pretended confederate government.

"2. All who left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion.

"3. All who shall have been military or naval officers of said pretended confederate government, above the rank of colonel in the army, or lieutenant in the navy.

"4. All who left seats in the Congress of the United States to aid the rebellion.

"5. All who resigned or tendered resignations of their commissions in the Army and Navy of the United States, to evade their duty in resisting the rebellion.

"6. All who have engaged in any way in treating otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war persons found in the United States service, as officers, soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity."

President Lincoln further declared:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.'"

It will be seen by this proclamation that President Lincoln looked forward to a "reinauguration," to use his own language, of "loyal State governments" in the rebel States at the earliest possible moment. His plan proposed that whenever it could be ascertained that one tenth in number of the votes cast in any one of the so-called confederate States at the presidential election in 1860, each having taken the oath prescribed, and being a qualified voter by the election law in force immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, those persons should have the privilege of reestablishing a State government which was required to be republican in form; and when established it was to be recognized as the true government of such State. For the purpose of my argument, I am not called upon to argue the question whether this plan was a wise or a foolish one. It is a fact well understood that President Lincoln consistently and pertinaciously adhered to this plan for the reorganization of civil governments in the rebel States until the day of his death. In subsequent messages to Congress, in official proclamations, in private conversations, and by public address, he reiterated and reaffirmed his adherence to this plan. In his last public address, on the evening of the 11th of April, he used the following language:

"In my annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying the proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction, as the phrase goes, which I promised, if adopted by any State, would be acceptable and sustained by the Executive Government of the nation. I distinctly stated that it was a plan which might possibly be acceptable, and also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States.

"The plan was, in advance, submitted to the Cabinet, and approved by every member of it. One of them suggested that I should then apply the emancipation proclamation thereto, except in parts of Virginia and Louisiana, and that I should drop the suggestion about apprenticeship for freed people, and that I should omit the protest against my own power in regard to admission of members of Congress; but even he approved every part and parcel of the plan which has since been employed or touched by the action of Louisiana."

It was in this speech he gave in his quaint and happy style his solution of the question as to the political status of the rebel States, "that they were not in their proper relation to the General Government." It is a fact well understood, that no measure of Mr. Lincoln's administration, except the emancipation proclamation, was more thoroughly discussed and better understood by the people than this. At the time it was proposed, political parties were directing their attention to the approaching presidential election, and Mr. Lincoln was a candidate for reelection. This measure became the subject, among both political friends and foes, of discussion and criticism, in oral controversy, and by the press. The feeble opposition to Mr. Lincoln among his political friends was hushed into silence by the unmistakable public voice demanding his renomination and reelection. The national Union convention on the 7th of June following, by a unanimous vote placed Mr. Lincoln before the public for a reelection. Subsequent to his nomination Congress passed a bill which was sent to the President for his approval, making provision for the reorganization of civil governments in the rebel States, essentially different in its provisions from the plan proposed by the President. Either for want of time, or disapproval of its provisions, or both, the President omitted to return the bill with his approval. On the 7th of August immediately following, two distinguished gentlemen occupying high official positions, one a member of the Senate and the other of the House of Representatives in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, arraigned the President in a paper published in the New York Tribune called the "Protest" with a bitterness that attracted the attention of the whole country. I have no disposition to reflect upon the honor or patriotism of the living or the memory of the dead; but I feel authorized by the facts in saying, in vindication of the truth of history, that upon the issue raised by those gentlemen with President Lincoln the loyal Union men of the country almost unanimously sustained the Executive. Upon this and other issues Mr. Lincoln was reelected President by an overwhelming and unprecedented majority; and there was no time during his Administration when the American people had more confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of his Administration than they had on the day he was stricken down by the assassin. I may have occasion, if my brief hour permits, again to allude to this congressional plan.

If I were called upon, Mr. Chairman, to explain the key to Abraham Lincoln's wonderful popularity, and his hold upon the hearts of his countrymen, my answer would be, "He possessed a soul free from all narrow-mindedness and prejudice." In him what a striking exemplification of the lesson inculcated by the renowned philosopher of poetry:

"The quality of mercy is not strained;"

"It is twice blessed;

It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

In his second inaugural address, from the fullness of a magnanimous soul, Abraham Lincoln gave utterance to a sentiment that will place his name in the list of the very few whose memory will never die:

"With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, for his widow and his orphan, to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and a lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Upon the accession of Andrew Johnson to the Presidency the path of duty was plain. A wise and harmonious Cabinet, enjoying the confidence of their countrymen, by the blessings of divine Providence, survived the assassination of President Lincoln. He had been the successful candidate for the second office on the same ticket, supported by the same party, and was supposed to entertain the same sentiments and views. On entering upon the discharge of the responsible duties of Chief Magistrate of the nation, Mr. Johnson found a policy inaugurated by his illustrious predecessor that had received the sanction of the American people in the most authoritative manner. Any departure on his part from that policy, in the absence of newly developed lights, would have been a betrayal of public confidence, and subjected him justly to the charge of perfidy to his party and the country. On entering upon the discharge of his duties, Mr. Johnson found the rebellion substantially suppressed. The amnesty proclamation issued by President Lincoln on the 8th of December, 1863, was still in full force, but it was thought by some pardon and amnesty could only be obtained under that proclamation for offenses committed prior to that date; and that a new amnesty proclamation might be required for those whose offenses were of a subsequent date. On the 29th day of May, 1865, President Johnson issued his proclamation of amnesty. The oath prescribed by Mr. Johnson I will now, by the indulgence of the committee, read:

"I do solemnly swear or affirm, in the presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully defend the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder; and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all the laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. So help me God."

It will be seen this oath is precisely the same as that prescribed by President Lincoln, with this clause omitted:

"So long and so far as not modified or declared void by the decision of the Supreme Court."

I invite the examination of the committee to this proclamation. It will be seen that both reserved to themselves the privilege, upon special application, to grant special pardons, and both made exceptions. President Johnson's exceptions embraced the same as President Lincoln's, and in addition eight other classes which I will now read:

"7. All persons who have been or are absentees from the United States for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

"8. All military or naval officers in the rebel service who were educated by the Government in the Military Academy at West Point, or at the United States Naval Academy.

"9. All persons who held the pretended offices of Governors of States in insurrection against the United States.

"10. All persons who left their homes within the jurisdiction and protection of the United States, and passed beyond the Federal military lines into the so-called confederate States, for the purpose of aiding the rebellion.

"11. All persons who have engaged in the destruction of the commerce of the United States upon the high seas, and all persons who have made raids into the United States from Canada, or been engaged in destroying the commerce of the United States upon the lakes and rivers that separate the British Provinces from the United States.

"12. All persons who, at the time when they seek to obtain the benefit thereof, by taking the oath herein prescribed, are in military or civil confinement or custody, or under bond of the military or naval authorities or agents of the United States, as prisoners of war, or persons detained for offenses of any kind, either before or after their conviction.

"13. All persons who have voluntarily participated in said rebellion, and the estimated value of whose taxable property is over twenty thousand dollars.

"14. All persons who have taken the oath of amnesty, as prescribed in the President's proclamation of December 28, or the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States, since the date of said proclamation, and who have not thenceforward kept and maintained the same inviolate; provided, that special application may be made to the President for pardon, by any person belonging to the excepted classes, and such leniency will be liberally extended as may be consistent with the facts and the peace and dignity of the United States."

I ought, perhaps, to call the attention of the committee in this connection to the act of Congress, approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes."

The provision to which I call your attention reads as follows:

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State, or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such time, and on such conditions, as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

This law is now in full force.

Perhaps in the absence of this provision the President possessed the power under the constitutional provision to release forfeitures under the confiscation law, as well as to grant pardon and amnesty to rebels and other offenders, but whether the power is vested by the Constitution or not, the enactment of the law is a sanction by Congress of the exercise of that power on the part of the Executive.

It will be borne in mind that under Mr. Lincoln's plan and during his administration, military governors were appointed for the States of Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas, civil governments restored, free constitutions adopted, and slavery was abolished.

On the 29th day of May, being the same day Mr. Johnson issued his amnesty proclamation, he issued his proclamation appointing William W. Holden, provisional governor of the State of North Carolina, and containing rules and regulations for his direction and guidance in his administration.

In like manner, immediately after, other provisional governors were appointed for the other so-called "confederate States," with like rules and regulations.

I shall only invite the attention of the committee to the North Carolina proclamation. The preamble recites the fourth section of the Constitution, declaring that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and protect each against invasion and domestic violence; makes the further recital of the constitutional provision, making the President Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, as well as the chief executive officer of the nation, bound by solemn oath to see that the laws be faithfully executed; and making a further recital, that the rebellion which had been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof, in a most violent and revolting form, and which had deprived the people of North Carolina of civil government; and then the preamble concludes as follows:

"Whereas it becomes necessary and proper to carry out and enforce the obligations of the United States to the people of North Carolina in securing them in the enjoyment of a republican form of government."

I will now by the indulgence of the committee read that part of the proclamation I deem necessary to a proper understanding of its provisions:

"I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby appoint William W. Holden provisional governor of the State of North Carolina, whose duty it shall be, at the earliest practicable period, to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof, and with authority to exercise within the limits of said State all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relation to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence; provided that in any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector, or shall be eligible as a member of such convention, unless he shall previously have taken and subscribed the oath of amnesty as set forth in the President's proclamation, May 29, 1864, and is a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State of North Carolina in force immediately before the 20th day of May, A. D. 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession, and the said convention when convened, or the Legislature that may be thereafter assembled, will prescribe the qualification of electors and the eligibility of persons to hold office under the constitution and laws of the State—a power the people of the several States composing the Federal Union have rightfully exercised from the origin of the Government to the present time."

In this proclamation the President required the military commander of the department and all other officers in the military and naval service to coöperate with Governor Holden in the organization of a State government. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, and the heads of the various Departments were required to appoint revenue officers, make provision for the collection of the revenues, appoint postmasters, mail agents, and establish a postal system throughout the State, and do all other things needful to a prompt and immediate execution of the laws of the United States in said State of North Carolina.

It will be seen by an examination of this plan of President Johnson's, that in all its essential features it is precisely the same as that inaugurated by Mr. Lincoln, and to which he adhered to the day of his death.

The provisional governor, William W. Holden, was required to call a convention to alter or amend the constitution and make immediate provision for the reestablishment of civil government in that State. He was further required to prescribe such rules and regulations as might be necessary for convening the convention, composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of that State who were loyal to the Government of the United States. And none were to be permitted to vote or be eligible to a seat in the convention, only those who had taken the oath prescribed in the amnesty proclamation of that date, and possessed the qualifications of a voter by the constitution and laws in force in that State on the 20th day of May 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there are irregularities in this plan that a technical lawyer who has devoted himself for a lifetime to the quibbles of his profession would be likely to criticize and censure. The practical statesman, however, in a great emergency is required to rise above the narrow views of the profession. There is a law of necessity, anterior to all written constitutions and written laws, that in the convulsions of society must and often does regulate and govern the conduct of those in authority. Upon the suppression of the rebellion, so far as civil government was concerned, chaotic confusion reigned in the so-called confederate States. The pretended ordinances of secession and all authority and acts under them being a usurpation, were null and void. The constitution and laws in force at the time of their adoption, incapable of annihilation by force or violence, had lost their vitality in the absence of the proper machinery of Government to execute and administer them.

A restoration of order and civil government out of the chaos and confusion that prevailed in those States, would necessarily encounter technical irregularity, whether conducted by the legislative or the executive department of the Government.

Let us now look for a moment at the condition of affairs at the time Mr. Johnson entered upon the discharge of his official duties. The war was substantially ended. Lee had surrendered his army to General Grant, and the remaining military force of the southern confederacy was rapidly melting away. The constitutional amendment abolishing slavery had been proposed by Congress, but whether its ratification by the necessary number of States to secure its adoption could be obtained was a question, to say the least, that excited the fears as well as the hopes of the loyal men of the country.

The emancipation proclamation was a military measure. What its effect would be in sections in the rebel States, in abolishing slavery, where the relation of master and slave had not been severed by military force, when the war was over, and the local and municipal law sustaining that relation restored, was a question that even President Lincoln seemed to have his doubts. Secretary Seward, in his Auburn speech before the presidential election, in allusion to this question, said it would be one for the decision of the legislative councils and the judicial tribunals of the country.

This monster crime against humanity had shocked the moral sense of the world and deluged a nation in blood. In view of the desolation and sacrifices it had caused, all good men felt that the only safe and sure guarantee for our future safety and peace was to make irrevocable the destruction of this "sum of all villainies." With this cause of the war removed, the great mass of Union men believed the two sections of the country, "like kindred drops of water, would mingle into one." The President at once took a firm and a manly position. He said to the South, in the most emphatic and authoritative manner, in the work of reconstruction you must acknowledge and recognize the fact that a state of war has freed your slaves. In this bold, humane, and patriotic position he never faltered, and to-day we are a nation of freemen. No slave breathes our air; "the moment his feet press our soil his limbs swell beyond the measure of his chains, and he stands redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the genius of universal emancipation." This, Mr. Chairman, is one of the fruits of that irregularity. The rebel States during the war had contracted untold millions of indebtedness, which the President required them, by an amendment to their constitutions, to repudiate. Another technical irregularity. A repeal of the ordinances of secession was another.

These are the fruits of that irregularity. It would have been just as easy for the President to have said to those States, "Take your constitutions and laws in force at the time of the adoption of the so-called ordinances of secession, and reconstruct civil governments upon their principles and in accordance with their provisions." It would have been certainly technically more regular, but by such a proceeding unarmisted rebels would have been restored to the possession of the local governments. The policy of the President seemed to be to interfere as little as possible with their former system of government, and at the same time secure the necessary guarantees for future peace. The proceeding of the barons of England at Runnymede in the thirteenth century, in extorting from King John the Great Charter, the foundation of English liberty, in a technical point of view was certainly one of great irregularity. Their defense was, a great occasion forced upon them the necessity for such a proceeding for their safety, and that event forms the greatest epoch in English history, and its influence upon the happiness of mankind will be felt down to the last syllable of recorded time.

In considering the policy of the President it must be remembered that in all the rebel States civil governments have been established and the provisional governments have been withdrawn, except in the State of Texas. A large military establishment and the Freedmen's Bureau are still retained to enforce obedience to the law as well as protection to the freedmen. How long it may be necessary to continue military garrisons and the Freedmen's Bureau in those States time, an essential element in all reformations, can alone determine. As soon as the Government can be relieved of their expense, in safety to the country, I am in favor of their withdrawal; but in this matter my policy is "to make haste slowly." And for the time being, at least, I am opposed to their withdrawal.

I have now done with this branch of my subject. It will be remembered President Lincoln, in his speech at the Executive Mansion, after the surrender of Lee, from which I have already made quotations, said expressly with reference to the plan of reconstruction he proposed, "if adopted by any State would be acceptable and be sustained by the Executive Government of the nation." In the same speech, and almost in the same breath, he made the following emphatic declaration:

"I distinctly stated that it was a plan which might possibly be acceptable, and also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

It will be observed from the careful and cautious language of President Lincoln, there was another branch of the Government to which those States, when their civil governments were restored, would have to look for recognition. He said "it was a plan which might possibly be acceptable." Acceptable to whom? My answer is, acceptable to Congress, in whom is vested by the Constitution the supreme legislative power of the nation, subject only to its own limitations and restrictions. In the message we are now considering, President Johnson uses the following language, which may be considered the counterpart to the speech of President Lincoln which I have just quoted:

"Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

The brief hour allotted will not permit me to discuss at this time the question of the political status of the so-called "confederate States." Upon the suppression of the rebellion they could not be considered States in political parlance, either in or out of the Union. The term "States" implies a political commonwealth, with executive, legislative, and judiciary departments. In those States, these, with all the machinery of civil government, were destroyed by the war. In the absence of civil governments and from the necessity of the case, the President established military governments, which have been superseded by civil governments, established under the military orders of the President in the manner I have already narrated. These civil governments, thus organized, are in the nature of military governments, being the agencies of the Commander-in-Chief, for those States whose rightful civil governments had been destroyed by the rebellion.

I therefore, Mr. Chairman, not only claim the right and power of Congress to review what has been done in the restoration of civil governments in the rebel States, but maintain that it is the duty of Congress, by appropriate legislation, to legalize their validity and restore those States to their proper relation to the General Government. Before this is done, Mr. Chairman, and members from those States are admitted to their seats in this House, I desire to see an amendment made to the Constitution changing the basis of representation from population to voters, or its equivalent, so as to conform to the new order of things created by the war. Ample and complete protection to the freedmen in all their rights of persons and of property to the full extent enjoyed by all non-voting classes is demanded alike by every consideration of humanity, as well as by the unmistakable voice of their grateful countrymen. In the darkest hour of our country's peril, by their fidelity to the cause of the Union they not only earned their freedom but that protection from the Government which the great and the good of all conditions of society demand for them.

As soon as these objects can be attained, and they elect loyal men who can take the oath, I am in favor of a restoration of all the States to their proper relation to the General Government.

I heartily approve of what has been done by the President. He has acted wisely, in good faith, and in obedience to the will of the nation. With malice toward none, with charity for all, his policy has been wise, magnanimous, and conciliatory.

In our deliberations it seems to me our aim should be to heal and not to irritate, to bind up the nation's wounds, and so conduct our legislation as to restore to all parts of our heretofore unhappy and distracted country concord and harmony.

ADMISSION OF THE SOUTHERN STATES, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the subject now agitating the public mind is the reconstruction of the late rebel States governments. In considering it, we are met at the threshold with the question, have these States, by reason of the conduct and acts of a portion of their citizens, been thereby placed without the Union? And are they now in a territorial condition, and in consequence under the control of Congress, as in the case of Territories not formed into States? It is proper, in examining this matter, that we lay aside all bitterness of spirit, and seek to do that which is best for the good of the country. There is no occasion to dwell upon or reproduce the sorrows of the past.

If, as is contended, these States are out of the Union, then they have become a non-descript community, without law or order. I affirm that these States have never been out of the Union. To say they have is to admit the doctrine of the right of secession, and assert that we now hold them by force of arms. We have been fighting for nothing except to deny and prevent the exercise of the right of secession. This right could only be allowed by the consent of the States in the Union; and if not agreed to, then it must be obtained by force, which, until successful, is rebellion, being while in doubt by one side held to be rebellion, and by the other revolution; but failing in success, the rights and positions remain as before the war commenced. The fact that a majority of the people was in a state of insurrection does not carry with it a forfeiture of the State privileges and immunities, which are the right of those who remain loyal.

President Johnson has stated this doctrine in the most simple and conclusive manner, when he asserted in his message that a State cannot commit treason, but that individuals can commit treason and subject themselves to punishment, but cannot entail punishment upon those who have remained loyal and innocent. No one ever heard of an indictment against a State, city, or even a corporation for treason, murder, felony, or any other similar offense.

"Shay's insurrection" in Massachusetts occurred under the Articles of Confederation, and before the adoption of the Federal Constitution. And we have in our history but one analogous case, to wit, "the western insurrection" in the year 1794, which was organized by citizens of the western counties of Pennsylvania, the western part of Virginia, (now a part of West Virginia,) and the Northwestern Territory (now the State of Ohio.) They were in rebellion. General Washington proceeded against them, and when they submitted, the soil was again placed under their control, and their people were restored to all their civil rights. The late rebellion and the western insurrection do not differ one jot except in the magnitude of the numbers engaged.

I do not rely alone upon this precedent. I propose to show that the Republican party, who now claim to have the entire control of the terms of the readjustment of these vexed questions between the several State authorities and the Federal Government, have by their own acts and the legislation they have adopted deliberately established that these States have never been out of the Union, and they have been permitted to exercise the highest powers granted in the Constitution, on the assumption that they were part of the Union.

Let us examine the record of Tennessee. A majority of the people of that State voted to approve the act of secession. Notwithstanding, Andrew Johnson remained in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from that State for a long period of time after the secession ordinance was approved by the people, and yet no one in or out of the Senate ever called in question his right to a seat in that body, thereby admitting that Tennessee was a State in the Union and had a right of representation in Congress.

Article two, section one, clause four, of the Constitution declares that—

"No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President."

Article twelve of the amendments adopted September 25, 1804, provides that—

"No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States."

The Republican national convention convened to nominate candidates for President and Vice President was held in the city of Baltimore in June, 1864. Every delegate in that convention who voted to place Andrew Johnson in nomination as the Republican candidate for Vice President recognized and solemnly declared that Tennessee was a State in the Union, that Andrew Johnson was a citizen of that State, and by virtue of that political right and that alone was eligible to the office of Vice President of the United States. That convention, after argument and deliberation, determined by a decided vote to admit delegates from the States of Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas, with all the privileges as equals in every respect with other delegates, and the delegates from those States voted and assisted in the nomination of candidates and the settlement of the platform of principles; and thus the convention clearly acknowledged that those States were then a portion of the Union. This was done in full response to the requirement embraced in the terms of the Constitution heretofore quoted.

Every State convention which ratified that nomination made the same declaration to the world.

Every qualified voter throughout the United States who voted the Lincoln and Johnson electoral ticket in his respective State reaffirmed this fact.

On the 7th day of December, 1864, the day on which the electors voted in the respective States, Andrew Johnson was a citizen of Tennessee and of no other State. It follows, then, that if Tennessee was not a State in the Union on that day, that Andrew Johnson was not a citizen of the United States, and not eligible to the office to which he was subsequently elected. This is one of the many absurdities to which gentlemen are driven who maintain that the rebel States are no portion of the Union.

On the 18th day of February, 1865, a joint convention of the two Houses of Congress was held "for the purpose of opening, determining, and declaring the votes for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of four years, commencing on the 4th of March next ensuing." And after opening and counting the votes, Vice President Hamlin, in the most solemn discharge of his duty, and without objection from any, said:

"Wherefore, I do declare that Abraham Lincoln, of the State of Illinois, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1865. And that Andrew Johnson, of the State of Tennessee, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes for Vice President of the United States, is duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865."

Thus, declaring Tennessee to be a State in the Union.

Further, on the 4th day of March, 1865, Andrew Johnson was inaugurated Vice President of the United States, claiming to be and was declared to be a citizen of the State of Tennessee.

The ratification of the ordinance of secession of Tennessee by a majority of the voters of that State was announced by Governor Harris on the 24th of June, 1861. On the 2d day of December, 1861, Horace Maynard presented himself at the bar of the Thirty-Seventh Congress as a member from the State of Tennessee, was qualified and took his seat. On the 23d of January, 1862, Mr. Clements was qualified; and on the 25th of January, 1863, Mr. Bridges appeared and was qualified. All these from the State of Tennessee. These gentlemen remained as sitting members until the expiration of the Thirty-Seventh Congress March 4, 1863. I would like to know the difference in the condition and the status of Tennessee at the dates I have named (all after the date of the secession ordinance,) and Tennessee, as we find her to-day. There is none, and none can be stated.

As if to make the position of the Republican party more glaring and bare in its inconsistency, the same gentleman, (Mr. Maynard,) who was qualified in December, 1861, and held his seat until March, 1863, now presents himself with similar credentials from the same district and people, and is at this time refused admission by this House.

It is impossible to escape from these free-will expressions and constitutional acts. If ever there was a question upon which the Republican party was collectively and individually committed, it is this which they now seek to avoid.

The Thirty-Eighth Congress passed an act, which was approved and signed by President Lincoln, entitled "An act to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes." This law was to keep alive the powers of the United States court in the State of Tennessee, and for its removal to Memphis. The existence of Tennessee as a State was thereby fully acknowledged.

The most important and conclusive proof of the soundness of the doctrine I have stated is to be found in the recognition of West Virginia as a newly erected State in the Union. Before I proceed to examine the provisions of the Federal Constitution upon the subject of the admission of new States and the admission of West Virginia as an independent State in the Union, I will recapitulate some of the antecedents of that act. A convention, professing to represent the whole State of old Virginia, in April, 1861, determined to secede from the Union, and submitted their decision to a vote of the people of that State. The State authorities decided that a majority of the people had affirmed the act of secession. I do not enter into the accuracy of that vote, although I believe a majority of the people of Virginia was at that time opposed to secession.

The people of the western counties of Virginia were with great unanimity loyal and opposed to secession. A portion of what may be called East Virginia agreed in sentiment with the people of West Virginia. These people very properly determined to treat this act of secession as a nullity, elected a Governor and a Legislature. They organized and constituted what is called the "Pierpoint government" of Virginia. It has been held that the "Pierpoint government" was legally constituted, and I believe does not depend upon whether they had the allegiance of a majority of the people or not. They were the only loyal people in the State, and if the rest chose to disfranchise themselves, they could not expatriate that portion of the people who were true in their fidelity to the Constitution of the Federal Government. This principle is illustrated every day; the legality of an election never can depend upon the number of votes cast, and if a majority refuse to vote it does not impugn the validity of an election.

The people of West Virginia, in June, 1861, petitioned the Pierpoint Legislature to be formed and erected into a new and independent State. That Legislature, in August, 1861, granted the petition, and the Congress of the United States, and Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, approved of and ratified these proceedings, and erected the western part of Virginia into a new State called West Virginia, which was thus organized. All the Federal officers were duly appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. She sent her three Representatives to this House, and they or their successors now occupy seats without cavil or doubt. The Senators duly elected by the Legislature of West Virginia were admitted into the Senate of the United States, and they or their successors also occupy seats.

Before I proceed to take the constitutional view of the subject I beg leave to state a fact antecedent in date but important to the question I have under consideration.

The State of Virginia, before the erection of the new State of West Virginia, and after the so-called secession of Virginia, sent Representatives to this House, Messrs. Segar, Upton, Carlile, Brown, and Whaley, who were admitted to seats on this floor. The two former came from the eastern part of Virginia. The Pierpoint Legislature elected two Senators, Messrs. Willey and Carlile, in place of Messrs. Mason and Hunter. They appeared, were qualified, and occupied their seats to the end of their respective terms of office. The same action was had during 1861, 1862, and 1863 in reference to Representatives from the States of Tennessee and Louisiana.

The Constitution of the United States provides in the fourth article, section three, as follows:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new States shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

This is the most potential power vested in Congress which relates to the internal concerns of the Union.

The erection of Vermont into a new State out of New Hampshire, Kentucky out of Virginia, Tennessee out of North Carolina, Mississippi and Alabama out of South Carolina and Georgia, and Maine out of Massachusetts, show that it is a power which has always been exercised with great care and after the most mature deliberation.

Apply these self-evident principles to the formation of West Virginia, and it establishes that Virginia after the vote of secession remained what Virginia was before the act, a free and independent State in the Union, competent to cede a portion of her territory to be erected into a new State; that Congress, when they confirmed the erection of West Virginia, recognized without limitation the power of Virginia to cede and the power of West Virginia to become a new State; that West Virginia stands at this day in the Union upon the same basis that Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, and Maine occupy, and if you deny the right of old Virginia to grant the territory and of West Virginia to become a free and independent State, you must deny the right of all the others which have been formed out of the thirteen colonial States. The process of formation has been literally the same in each of the cases.

The constitutional principles I have asserted are fully sustained by a report of the Judiciary Committee of this House, upon the transfer of Jefferson and Berkeley counties from Virginia to West Virginia.

The report is based upon the constitutional declarations, that Virginia was a State in the Union at the time of the act of secession, has been so during the period of the late rebellion, is so now, and that there is no power in the Government to deprive it of its sovereignty as a State in the Union.

On page 7 of that report the committee state:

"It is perfectly clear to your committee that Congress has no power to institute any measures or proceedings to change the boundaries of adjacent States, or to transfer territory from one to another. The States alone can make any changes in their boundaries or transfer territory from one to another, and Congress has no power over the subject except to ratify what they may do; and certainly, the power to ratify implies the power to refuse to ratify."

I ask the members of this House to be guided by the report of the Judiciary Committee; be consistent, and when Virginia or any other former rebel State seeks representation in this Congress by loyal men to grant such representation.

I know of no higher law in the country than the exposition of the Constitution by the Supreme Court of the United States. A reference to the decisions of that court settles beyond all controversy the doctrine which I am now endeavoring to support. In volume second of the decisions of that court, reported by J. W. Wallace, is to be found the case of the Circassian. This case was an appeal from the decision of the district court of the southern district of Florida. Its merits depended upon a proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, issued April 19, 1861, and all the facts of the case occurred subsequent to the act of secession by the State of Florida. The court entertained jurisdiction of the case, and thus declared that Florida remained a part of and was in fact within the Union. This is the deliberate judgment of Chief Justice Chase and his associate judges.

The same principle was again recognized as to the State of Florida in the cases of the Andromeda, the Venice, and the Beagorry.

Again, this principle was held in the case of Harvey vs. Tyler, which is an appeal from the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court and fully recognized the code of Virginia as in force, and thus established that Virginia was in the Union and had always been during the pendency of the case, which embraces the entire period of the rebellion. This is one of the most important opinions ever delivered on the subject of titles to lands by that court, the facts and merits of which are well known to the members on this floor from the State of West Virginia. The judgment is not founded upon any fabulous case, but where large interests were actually at stake. The opinions of individuals are brought here to overturn the solemn and deliberate decision of the supreme judicial authority of this land. It is left to this House to determine which shall have the most weight.

I have selected the cases specified from the last volume of the decisions of that court. Many others could be cited upon the same point, but time and labor prevent.

Mr. Lincoln before his death made all the appropriate appointments of Federal and district judges, marshals, assessors, and collectors of revenue and other officers in the States of Tennessee, Virginia, Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina, and other rebel States where ever the authority of the Government of the United States could be reestablished within them. Mr. Johnson since his accession to the Presidency has done the same. And the Senate of the United States have confirmed these appointments. The Supreme Court of the United States have recognized all these appointments and acts whenever they have come under their judicial notice.

The Government of the United States is divided into three distinct departments, each independent of the other—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. I have established by the record that each branch have in various ways and at different times affirmed that the rebel States have been without interruption and still are an integral part of the Union.

Throughout the whole period of Mr. Lincoln's administration, he uniformly promulgated one settled plan, that whenever the South should lay down their arms and surrender to the Government they would be received back; and almost the last public act of his, prior to his atrocious and fiend-like assassination, was to offer terms of peace, which, if they had been accepted, would now find these States fully represented in this House.

The act of Congress of March 12, 1863, protects the property of loyal citizens in the rebel States who have not given aid and comfort to the rebellion, and allows them two years after the suppression of the rebellion to recover their property. It is impossible to suppose that Congress would pass an act to protect the property of loyal citizens, and at the same time deprive them of their dearest political rights, one of which is representation in this House.

Mr. Lincoln, in his third annual message,

December 8, 1863, in discussing the reconstruction of the Union, expressed himself in the following words:

"In some States the elements for resumption seem ready for action, but remain inactive apparently for want of a rallying point, a plan of action. Why shall A adopt the plan of Brather than B that of A? And if A and B should agree, how shall they know but the General Government here will reject their plan? By the proclamation a plan is presented which may be accepted by them as a rallying point, and which they are assured in advance will not be rejected here."

The proclamation alluded to accompanied the message and is known as the "amnesty proclamation," and bears even date with the message quoted from. In this paper President Lincoln made a clear distinction between the States, as States, and the individuals within those States who had committed treason against the United States. These individuals he proposed to pardon upon certain conditions, with a limitation, however, as to certain other persons therein described. I quote:

"Therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have directly, or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them and to each of them, with restoration of all rights of property."

Then follow the conditions of such pardon, when he sets further forth—

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Virginia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election, A. D. 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election laws of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican and in nowise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.'"

Under the provisions of this proclamation the State governments of Louisiana and Arkansas were reestablished, and have continued ever since. The difference now and then being, that at the time specified Mr. Lincoln held that one tenth was sufficient, if loyal and oath bound. And now the entire population are in like manner loyal and ready to subscribe to such oath.

Mr. Lincoln ever continued to treat two of these States as in the Union, and so declared in his proclamation of the 8th day of July, 1864, giving his reasons for failing to sign an act entitled "An act to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government," passed July 2, 1864; with this further declaration, that he should recognize the others in like manner as soon as they laid down their arms and conformed with the terms of his proclamation of that date.

I give the words of his proclamation of July 8, 1864:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known, that, while I am (as I was in December last, when by proclamation I propounded a plan for restoration) unprepared, by a formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and while I am also unprepared to declare that the free State constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort, or to declare a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States, but am at the same time sincerely hoping and expecting that a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the nation may be adopted, nevertheless I am fully satisfied with the system for restoration contained in the bill as one very proper plan for the loyal people of any State choosing to adopt it, and that I am, and at all times shall be, prepared to give the executive aid and assistance to any such people, so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, in which cases military governors will be appointed with directions to proceed according to the bill."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING]

during the present session, in an elaborate speech, said:

"Now, a State may be in the Union as a subject of government, but may by misconduct forfeit its right as a part of the governing power."

The gentleman differs from my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who is more consistent in his doctrine when he maintained that the southern States are a conquered people, and without a status as States in the Union. The doctrine of the learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] amounts to this, that the eleven rebel States are in or out of the Union just as we please, and according as it suits our whim and caprice. His doctrine has not, as might appear, the merit of novelty. It is a paraphrase of the odious doctrine of nullification as adopted by the convention of South Carolina in 1832, which declared that South Carolina had the right to be in the Union or out of the Union, just as she pleased, and that she could declare that she was bound or not by the laws of the United States as she might determine.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] has informed us "that he who speaks on legal questions must talk well or not talk at all." This, sir, is a truism applicable to all questions before the House; and notwithstanding the admonition delivered, I shall proceed to examine the cases which he has quoted, and show that they are either totally irrelevant, or negative the principle he was endeavoring to support.

The first case to which he has referred is that of Penhallow et al. vs. Doane, 3 Dallas, page 54. It is a long and tedious case, determined upon facts and decisions prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and could not apply to the question of the right of a State to secede. The judge, Iredell, in delivering the opinion, entered into a lengthy discussion of the rights of the people collectively and individually under an absolute monarchy, a limited monarchy, and a republic. The learned judge could not have dreamed of or foreseen the present position of the South, and if he did it was as extra-judicial as the Dred Scott decision is alleged to be.

The gentleman, however, has selected a single sentence from the opinion of Judge Iredell. In 3 Dallas, 93, that court says:

"A distinction is taken at bar between a State and the people of a State. It is a distinction I am not capable of comprehending. By a State forming a republic, (speaking of it as a moral person,) I do not mean the Legislature of the State, the Executive of the State, or the judiciary, but all the citizens which compose the State, and are, if I may so express myself, integral parts of it, all together forming a body-politic."

If any inference, however, could be drawn favorably to the argument, the succeeding sentence of the opinion immediately dispels it, when he says:

"But in a republic, all the citizens as such are equals, and no citizen can rightfully exercise any authority over another but in virtue of a power constitutionally given by the whole community, and such authority, when exercised, is in effect an act of the whole community which forms such body-politic."

This citation reminds me of the couplet,
"Commentators have in Homer sought
More than Homer ever thought."

The next case is Luther vs. Borden et al., 7 Howard, page 1. This case arises out of Dorr's rebellion in 1842, and decides that when there are two opposing governments set up in a State the Federal judiciary will recognize the decision of the State judiciary as to which is the true representative of the people. It has no reference to secession, and in my view no opinion of the court in this case can be made to bear upon the secession of the southern States.

Another authority relied upon is what is called the prize cases, reported in 2 Black, page 635. These cases have been frequently referred to by gentlemen in this House, but at the risk of repetition I will look into them, so as to make my argument plain and conclusive in this direction. These cases arose out of captures by our Navy of vessels attempting to violate the blockade of the southern ports and export cotton to Europe, which trade gave aid and comfort to the so-called confederate government. Justice Grier delivered an elaborate opinion, entering into a discussion of maritime rights. He, however, reduces the case to a single point, and says it is immaterial whether the ship and cargo belong to a loyal citizen, a rebel traitor, or an ally. The ground of seizure is the illegal traffic or the breach of the blockade. But lest it might be inferred that these southern States so in rebellion were no part of the Union, he says in another part of the opinion:

"By the Constitution, Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State or any number of States by virtue of any clause in the Constitution."—Page 668.

Thus the decision of the present Supreme Court of the United States asserts in an explicit manner that neither Congress, the judiciary, the President, nor any other authority in this Government can declare war against one or more States. The citizens of a State may rebel and be punished, but the States remain intact within the Union.

Another case cited, and the last I shall notice, is that of Mrs. Alexander's cotton, reported in 2 Wallace, page 417. She was the owner of seventy-two bales of cotton, which were seized by the naval forces of the United States. She was a rebel, had assisted in erecting a rebel fort, and in many ways aided the rebellion. Cotton, as the courts say, was an element of the war, and was relied upon by the so-called confederate government. That government had protected this very cotton from conflagration as a reward, and also to enable her to export it.

The court decided that it was forfeited to the United States.

But the court gave her the privileges if she could prove her loyalty and show no complicity with the rebel government, that she might come in and under the act of Congress of 12th March, 1863, at any time within two years, and receive the proceeds of her property which had been seized and sold by order of the court.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as far as I am able to hear or read, fully acquiesce in the principle, that any loyal citizen who had done no act to aid or assist the rebellion, or who has not voluntarily permitted his property to be used by the rebel authorities, remains a citizen of the United States with the same rights and privileges which he had before the commencement of the rebellion, that he is now a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights of life, liberty, and property guarantied by the Federal Constitution, of which representation on this floor is one.

Since I had prepared the remarks heretofore submitted the President of the United States has communicated to the Senate a correspondence between himself and Chief Justice Chase, which requires my attention because the answer of the Chief Justice is at variance with the statements I have made.

On the 2d of October, 1865, the President wrote to the Chief Justice that it might become necessary that the Government should prosecute some for high crimes and misdemeanors committed against the United States in the district of Virginia, and inquires whether he or either of his associates will hold a court there during the autumn or winter.

On the 12th of October, 1865, Mr. Chase answers that he refuses to comply with the request; suggests that a military court would answer the purposes, and concludes by saying that he shall wait "until Congress shall have had an opportunity to consider and act on the whole subject."

The meaning of the answer is that the Chief Justice prefers a military court to the highest civil tribunal of the country, and that the trial by jury is dependent upon the opinion of a majority in Congress, and not upon the enforcement of the Constitution and the laws through the judiciary of the country.

I should not, however, have noticed this correspondence but for the following remark made by the Chief Justice:

"The Supreme Court has hitherto declined to consider cases brought before it by appeal or writ of error from circuit or district courts in the rebel portion of our country."

This is at total variance with the record.

In the prize cases reported in 2 Black, page 635, they were appeals from the Federal district courts of Massachusetts, New York, and Florida. The case of the Brillante was an appeal from the Federal district court of Florida, and no discrimination was made between that case and the others.

In 2 Wallace, page 135, the Supreme Court of the United States, at the December term, 1864, entertained an appeal from the district court of the southern district of Florida, in the case of Circassian. This case was argued and the opinion was delivered by the Chief Justice, affirming the judgment of the court below, condemning the ship and cargo as a lawful prize.

The same court entertained an appeal from the district court of the southern district of Florida, in the case of the Venice, and the opinion of the court was delivered by the Chief Justice, affirming the decree of the court below, restoring the ship and cargo to their owners. In the cases of the Biagorry and Andromeda, 2 Wallace, the court entertained similar appeals and pronounced the final decrees.

The case of Harvey vs. Tyler was an ejectment commenced before the rebellion began in the Federal court of the western district of Virginia, and was a decision upon a writ of error; this was during December, 1864.

Without fear of successful contradiction I assert:

1. That the Constitution of the United States was for a perpetual Union without limitation as to time; and that the eleven rebel States had no right to secede from and deny their allegiance to that Constitution and Union.

2. That the conventions of the States which adopted the acts of secession respectively exercised powers which they had voluntarily surrendered to the General Government, and are consequently null and void.

3. That the individuals who thus seceded, and those who aided and abetted them by force in this secession, are in their own proper persons liable for the acts and offenses they have thus committed against the Constitution of the United States and the laws thereunder; that these individuals are liable to the executive and judicial departments of the Government where the exclusive power rests to pardon or to punish.

4. That the citizens and inhabitants of the rebel States who remained faithful to the Union retain their rights and privileges in the same manner as though they had not been interfered with. They cannot be impaired nor taken from them by any power, and therefore those States remained as they were at the beginning and during the rebellion, in the Union. There is no distinction as to the rebel States. All of them stand upon the same footing in their relations to the Union. They differ only as to the order of dates in their respective acts of secession.

Before I conclude, I wish to place this subject in one more aspect.

The question now before the House is not the repeal of the test oath. We have all taken it, and at present no new member can be admitted without taking it. The issue to be decided is, whether loyal citizens of the southern States shall enjoy the rights of representation on this floor by loyal Representatives.

There is no principle in a republican Government more universally acknowledged than that taxation and representation are the correlatives of each other. The imposition of the ship tax cost Charles I his crown and his head. The imposition of the stamp tax and tea duty, cost the mother country the thirteen colonies. In both instances the impost was trifling, but it involved a principle which was sacred and inviolate. We are now imposing upon these loyal citizens all the taxes, duties, and burdens common to every part of our country. We are daily receiving revenue from them, and we are all anticipating the products of their soil to aid and assist us in meeting the expenses of and demands upon the General Government. Yet we refuse them representation on the floor of this House. I tell the majority here that such a course is too odious and unjust to continue any length of time, and the sooner they abandon it the better for themselves and the country at large. Having clearly established in my argument that these States are in the Union, I shall briefly advert, before concluding, to a practical view of the subject as it relates to the future, one which we ought to consider and reflect upon.

I assert that the cultivation and productions of the South are necessary to the payment of the public debt. At no distant time the truth of this fact will be undisputed. Every day that the reconstruction of the rebel States is delayed the more is the ability of our keeping the public faith put in jeopardy.

With an adjustment of their labor system, which can best be made successful by experience among and with themselves, the South can aid materially in the payment of the national indebtedness, to an extent, as I consider, of one fourth, if not one third. Are the people of the North to continue to have this vast sum unnecessarily taken from their hard earnings? Yet such will be the inevitable result. Looking, therefore, at this question financially, and being anxious for all the relief we can obtain from our present heavy taxation, I consider that reconstruction should be immediate. It is manifest that the people of the southern States do not desire to, nor could they if disposed, make further resistance. Our best guarantee is that their lives and their happiness and prosperity as a people are directly involved for good or for evil.

The productions of the South are absolutely essential to our proper balance in trade with foreign countries, and a resumption of specie payments cannot with entire safety take place until foreign exchange shall be in our favor. In this mode the exportation of specie will be prevented and in all probability a crisis averted. The prosperity of the New England, the middle, and the western States alike is vitally at issue. If the better feeling of generosity to a fallen foe has no place in your minds, then self-interest should prompt the action I have indicated.

The financial reconstruction is as important to the welfare of the whole people as the geographical and political reconstruction of the States. It is as the right hand is to the left. Holding the sentiments and believing that the people of the South have been and are now willing to comply with every requirement suggested by Presidents Lincoln and Johnson, I shall vote for full restoration of the Union by admitting the southern States to a representation on this floor, and I shall vote against any proposition which shall hinder or delay the consummation of so great a national blessing.

LAW OF TREASON.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would not consume the time of the House upon a subject to which our attention has been invited by the President in his message but for the fact that as yet it has received no consideration at our hands. Whatever of law may be necessary to enable the courts to perform their appropriate functions in civil and criminal cases, and whatever of congressional action may be requisite to bring military offenders to justice, it is the duty of Congress in the constitutional forms to provide.

I propose now, as briefly as I can, to vindicate the policy of the Government in relation to the trial and punishment of traitors, so that "with malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right," the nation, in the exercise of clemency, may yet demonstrate its power and its purpose to do justice. That policy was indorsed by resolutions I had the honor to introduce on the 20th of December, and is in brief this: that some of the great conspirators who inaugurated the rebellion, and of those most conspicuous in conducting hostilities, should be tried in the civil courts for treason and be punished; but that military offenders, as those who assassinated military officers on duty, and those guilty of the murder and starvation of Union prisoners of war, should be tried and punished by military tribunals. (Attorney General's Letter, January 4.) I had not proposed to discuss this policy until I found it assailed in a dignified law book, and by traitors and their sympathizers everywhere.

THE NATION DEMANDS JUSTICE.

Governor Fairchild, of Wisconsin, uttered the loyal sentiment of the nation when, in his inaugural of January 1, he said:

"The verdict of the American people is, that any attempt to right fancied or real grievances by force of arms is treason. They ask, as they have a right to ask, that the highest judicial tribunal in the land shall give expression to that verdict, by a trial upon the charge of that high crime, in accordance with law, of the chief representative of the rebellion—the man who stood before the world as the acknowledged leader of traitors."

"Not until Jefferson Davis shall have been tried, convicted, and hanged for treason, and the fact that treason is a crime which cannot be committed with impunity shall have thus been full demonstrated, will the American people be content."

"The American people have demonstrated that the Union is one and indivisible; that its people, of whatever race or color, shall be forever free."

FOUR OBJECTIONS TO TRYING TRAITORS CONSIDERED.

The right to try, condemn, and execute the great conspirators has been denied, on the alleged authority of international and constitutional law, on these grounds:

1. That State secession is constitutional, and therefore the "levying of war" in its support is not treason.

2. That the rebellion was supported at least by a de facto government, to which we conceded belligerent rights, and therefore traitors are exempt from punishment.

3. That the Constitution declares that treason shall be tried "in the State where the crime shall have been committed," and there is not now any "State" legally existing in any of the country lately in rebellion, and therefore no civil court can be held.

And finally, it is said:

4. That it is impracticable to procure a competent jury for a civil trial, but that Davis at least should be tried and sentenced by a military tribunal.

The allotted time will not permit a full discussion of all these topics, nor is it necessary.

SECESSION UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

I will not argue the constitutional right of secession, for it is denied by all loyal men. If such right exist, the war on our part has been a stupendous crime against the Constitution and against humanity. Our whole history is full of the evidence and argument which disproves it, and to that I appeal. The verdict of war, "sanctified with the blood of half a million slain," has forever settled the question that there is no such constitutional right, and no other earthly tribunal can reverse or impair it.

SOVEREIGN AND BELLIGERENT RIGHTS—REBEL-LION PUNISHABLE AS TREASON.

But can this nation exercise sovereign as well as belligerent rights over rebels? In other words, do the belligerent rights conceded to rebels protect them from punishment in the civil courts?

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] during the discussion on the 21st of December, made the inquiry:

"I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he is entirely sure we have the right to try Jefferson Davis for treason, inasmuch as our Government has given to them belligerent rights, has recognized and respected the commissions that he has issued?"

This question must be answered in the affirmative upon two grounds: first, that treason was committed before belligerent rights had been acquired; and, second, that subsequent acts of treason are not by the law of nations exempt from civil punishment.

The voluntary "levying of war against the United States by one owing them allegiance, either perpetual or temporary, is treason." (United States vs. Wiltberger, 5 Wheaton, 97.)

That traitors did thus "levy war" is not denied. That they, citizens, did owe allegiance at the inception of the war and before any belligerent rights had been conceded is equally certain, and for that original "levying war" there is no shadow of defense. An act criminal when committed cannot become innocent by additional crime, (23 Law Register, Boston, 597; 2 Bishop's Criminal Law, 1204.)

I may admit that belligerent rights were conceded to the so-called "confederate States," (2 Black, 635,) and that the Constitution recognizes the law of nations as a part of the law of the land, (Attorney General's opinion, July, 1865.)

But as secession was unauthorized, the rebellion was not supported by a Government de jure. I might admit, what our nation denies, that the rebellion was supported by a de facto confederate Government; that insurrection had risen into rebellion, and this into civil war, yet all this does not, upon reason or authority, remove the penalties of treason.

This is affirmed by the elementary writers on international and criminal law and the highest judicial decisions.

Bello, whose work is cited with approval in the recent edition of Wheaton on International Law, says:

"When a sovereign has conquered the party opposed to him [in a civil war] and obliged it to demand peace, it is customary to concede to it a general amnesty, excepting from it the authors and chiefs, whom he may punish according to the laws."—Principios de Derecho Internacional, cap. x, page 267.

Vattel says:

"When the sovereign has subdued the opposite party, and reduced them to submit, and to sue for peace, he may except from the amnesty the authors of the disturbances—the heads of the party; he may bring them to a legal trial, and punish them if they be found guilty."—Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, ch. 18, sec. 205.

In Lawrence's Wheaton on International Law, it is said in a note to page 522.

"A civil war is when a party arises in a State, which no longer obeys the sovereign, and is sufficiently strong to make head against him, or when in a republic the nation is divided into two opposite factions and both sides take up arms."

"Civil war breaks the bonds of society and of the Government; it gives rise in a nation to two independent parties who acknowledge no common judge." "When the sovereign conquers the opposite party, and obliges it to demand peace, he may except from the amnesty, the authors of the troubles, the chiefs of the party, cause them to be judged according to the laws, and punish them if found guilty."

Bishop, in one of the ablest of all the works on criminal law, says:

"It is competent for the President, who is both military head and chief Executive of the civil department, to order a rebel captured in war to be tried by the judiciary, either during the progress of active hostilities, or after they have terminated in the subjugation of the rebel power."—Sec. 1222.

On the trial of the Savannah pirates in the southern district of New York, Nelson, J., with Shipman, J. concurring, said:

"It is claimed that the confederate States is a government at least de facto, and entitled to the rights and privileges that belong to a sovereign and independent nation." "This defense involves considerations that do not belong to the courts, questions which belong to the legislative and executive departments; and when decided by them the courts follow the decision; and until these departments have recognized the existence of the new government, the courts are obliged to regard the ancient state of things as remaining unchanged."—Warburton's Trial, 372.

In the prize cases, Mr. Justice Grier says:

"When the party in rebellion occupy and hold in a hostile manner a certain portion of territory," "the sovereign party treats them as insurgents, and rebels who owe allegiance, and should be punished with death for their treason."—2 Black, 667, United States Supreme Court.

And again the court say:

"Now it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights."—4 Cranch, 272; Congressional Globe, Thirty-Seventh Congress, second session, part 3, p. 2189, May 19, 1862; Rose vs. Humby, 4 Cranch, 272; Marshall, C. J., and Livingston, J., 288; Cheviott vs. Fousot, 3 Binney, R. 252; Upton's Maritime Warfare and Prize, 212; Grotius, de Jure Belli ac Pacis, lib. 1, cap. 3, sec. 1; Rex vs. Gordon, 1 East, P. C. 70; Respublica vs. McCarty, 2 Dall. 86; Russ. on Cr. 664; 1 Hume's Cr. L. 50; 1 Allison Cr. L. 627-673.

In England "the statute of 11 Henry VII, A. D. 1494, cap. 1, in effect declared that allegiance to a king de facto in exclusive possession protects the subject from future question." (2 English Statutes at Large, 82; Hale, P. C., 104; 4 Stephen's Blackstone, 221; Rowland, Manual English Const., 162; Lawrence's Wheaton, 525, note.)

But the belligerent and de facto rights of Cromwell's Government did not protect his officers from punishment for treason against the regal Government.

Charles I was executed on the 30th of January, 1648, for treason under a judicial sentence and warrant of Cromwell's judges. When Cromwell's Government, in the person of his successor, was overthrown and Charles II succeeded to the throne, Thomas Harrison and others of the judges who had signed the death-warrant of Charles I were indicted, tried, and executed by the sentence of a civil tribunal. Harrison interposed as a defense the authority of Cromwell's Parliament, of a de facto Government, of belligerent rights.

On the 11th of October, 1660, on trial he said—

"I say what was done was done by the authority of the Parliament, which was then the supreme authority, and that those that have acted under them are not to be questioned by any power less than them."

"What, therefore, any did in obedience to that power and authority they are not to be questioned for; otherwise we are in a most miserable condition, bound to obey them that are in authority, and yet to be punished if obeyed."

The Lord Chief Baron, overruling the defense, said:

"For the House of Commons to do such an act, it was void in itself; nay, any authority without House of Lords and King is void." "King, Lords, and Commons is the ground of the English law; without that no act of Parliament binds."—Trial of the Regicides, 50-55; 5 Hume's History England.

This subject did not escape the wise scrutiny of the framers of our own Constitution. Anxious as they were to define and limit treason, they were unwilling that the plea of "belligerent rights" or of "a de facto Government" should remove its penalties. My colleague, [MR. SPALDING,] distinguished as a statesman and jurist, has reminded us that in the Convention which framed the Constitution a proviso was offered to the third section of the third article in these words:

"Provided, That no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of any one of the United States, under the authority of one or more of the said States, shall be deemed treason or punished as such; but in case of war being levied by one or more of the States against the United States, the conduct of each party toward the other, and their adherents respectively, shall be regulated by the laws of war and of nations."

But Luther Martin, in his report to the Maryland Legislature, said:

"This provision was not adopted, and the consequence is, that the State and every one of its citizens who acts under its authority (in making war upon the Government of the nation) are guilty of a direct act of treason."—Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, page 382.

All who voluntarily engage, then, in a civil war, and who may not be included in amnesty or pardon, are liable to suffer the penalties of treason by civil sentence.

NATIONAL COURTS MAY BE HELD IN REBEL STATES.

I pass on to consider the objection that there is no legally existing "State" in which civil trials can be had. We have high authority for saying that Davis may be tried in Ohio, Kentucky, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, in all which he levied war. An able elementary writer has summed up, as the result of the authorities, the law in these words:

"That when war is actually levied by an assemblage of men, in a posture of war for a treasonable object, any one who, being leagued in the general conspiracy, performs any overt act constituting a part in such fact of levying war, however remote from the scene of action, or however minute that part, is guilty as a principal traitor."—Burr's Trial by Combs, 357; and see Senator Howard's Speech, February 1, 1866.

But if it be assumed that he can only be tried in Virginia, and that this State is without a legal State government, and that a de facto government is not to be recognized, all of which admits of discussion, the national courts may still exercise jurisdiction, for the geographical State alone is necessary for that purpose. They have been exercising unquestioned jurisdiction in more than one of the rebel States.

It is monstrous to assert that traitors can escape the penalty of treason by overturning a State government, by prefacing one crime with another.

Trials for treason may be had in Virginia, because it is the geographical State only which the Constitution demands—a question of venue merely.

Its object, says Judge Story,

"Is to secure the party accused from being dragged to a trial in some distant State away from his friends and witnesses."—2 Story, Constitution, 1799; 2 Elliot's Debates, 399.

As it is the duty of Congress to provide all necessary laws, we must inquire whether treason may be tried by civil or military tribunals, or all go unpunished.

TREASON NOT TRIABLE BY MILITARY TRIBUNAL—MILITARY OFFENSES MAY BE.

Mr. Bishop very strangely demands what the law does not permit after flagrant war has ceased, and after a surrender of all the rebel forces. He says:

"If, then, a leading rebel is to be executed, [merely as a conspirator,] the highest expediency, even almost the law itself, demands that he should not be sent to the judicial tribunals for his sentence, but that this shall be pronounced by a military tribunal."—2 Criminal Law, note, sec. 1222, edition 1865.

The Attorney General states the law differently:

"That the laws of war," says he, "authorized commanders to create and establish military commissions, courts, or tribunals for the trial of offenders against the laws of war, whether they be active or secret participants in the hostilities, cannot be denied."—Opinion, July, 1865. See Executive Document No. 5, Senate, Thirty-Ninth Congress, first session.

And he adds:

"It must be constantly borne in mind that such tribunals cannot exist except in time of war, and cannot then take cognizance of offenders or offenses where the civil courts are open, except offenders and offenses against the laws of war;"

which conspiracy and treason are not. But the war, in legal contemplation, begins and does not end until so declared by one or both of the political (not the judicial) departments of the Government.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [MR. RAYMOND] in describing the "period when war is not raging but is not yet ended" has described it as the period recognized by courts as "non flagrante sed nondum cessante bello." (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How. 194; 2 Black. R. 667; 25 Wend. 483; Letter of Attorney General to President, January 4, 1866.)

It was upon the authority of this opinion, of July, 1865, that the assassins of President Lincoln, and the infamous Wirz, were tried by military tribunal; the latter for the starvation and murder of Union prisoners of war; and the pirate Semmes, and others are now under arrest for trial; in like manner all offenders against the laws of war—hostes humani generis.

The military jurisdiction is clear. Referring to Mary, Queen of Scots, Ward, in his Law of Nations, says:

"In the case of a prisoner of war detained always in prison, and assenting to an act against the life of his conqueror, the true manner of proceeding against him would be in the summary way of martial law, without having recourse to the municipal courts of the country."—Vol. 2, p. 355; 25 Wend. 483; 1 Hilt. 377.

The President in his proclamation of May 2, 1865, informs us that—

"It appears from evidence in the Bureau of Military Justice that the atrocious murder of the late President Lincoln was incited and procured by Jefferson Davis, Clement C. Clay, and other rebels and traitors."

That some of the great rebels did know of and sanction the deliberate murder and starvation of Union prisoners of war cannot be doubted.

If these shall not be hung for treason, for one I would say let them receive justice at the hands of a military tribunal for these offenses against the laws of war.

But treason cannot be tried in a military tribunal; it must be tried in the civil courts, or escape all judicial condemnation and punishment. The Attorney General says:

"I have ever thought that trials for high treason cannot be had before a military tribunal. The civil courts have alone jurisdiction of that crime."—Opinion, January 4.

Nor can a military tribunal try and condemn a great traitor merely as the leader of a great rebellion. That would be to take military jurisdiction of treason under another name, unwarranted by enlightened precedent, contrary to the laws of nations, and revolting to the judicial and legal mind of the world.

THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION ON TRAITORS.

For one I indorse what the President says in his message on the subject of treason, that—

"Persons who are charged with its commission should have fair and impartial trials in the highest civil tribunals of the country."

And I am prepared to sanction all just legislation to accomplish it. Whoever repudiates this policy consents that treason shall escape all punishment. This will find a ready sanction and response in the sentiments and sympathies of rebels and of our enemies abroad; but of such I am not.

I indorse instead the Attorney General, who says:

"I think that it is the plain duty of the President to cause criminal prosecutions to be instituted before the proper [civil] tribunals and at all proper times against some of those who were mainly instrumental in inaugurating, and most conspicuous in conducting, the late hostilities. I should regard it as a direful calamity if many whom the sword has spared the law should spare also."—Letter to President, January 4.

The resolutions under consideration assign these reasons in favor of a civil trial:

"In order that the Constitution and the laws may be fully vindicated, the truth clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime, that traitors should be punished, and the offense made infamous, and, at the same time, that the question may be judicially settled, finally and forever, that no State of its own will has the right to renounce its place in the Union."

These are the words of the President. They are his reasons, not mine. Gentlemen who repudiate them condemn him, and not me. Their surpassing wisdom overshadows the President, not me.

But certainly it is desirable to have a judicial condemnation of secession and treason.

HAVE CONFIDENCE IN COURTS.

The profound learning and loyalty and purity of the august judicial tribunals of the nation command the admiration and respect, not only of this but of every land, and no lawyer can doubt but that they will truly interpret the Constitution and laws. A failure to invoke their judgment will inspire with new life and vigor the heresy of secession, not yet extinct, but living among the disloyal of the South and their sympathizers North. Even President Buchanan, in his last annual message, denied the power of Congress "to make war against a State." He is a bad citizen who contemns all judicial opinion, for when rightly settled it becomes a part of the Constitution and laws, and carries conviction to the minds of the people when force operating on fears alone may not. A judicial condemnation of secession does sanctify in history with additional weight, not only the irreversible verdict of war, but the justice of our struggle to achieve it.

He who asserts that an adverse judicial decision—a conceded impossibility—can change or impair the verdict of the war, fails to comprehend the magnitude of its results, and distrusts the loyalty of the people. No, no, the national life does not, cannot depend on the fate of a traitor, or the judgment of a court; but the national justice will be shocked if all treason shall go unpunished, or if the nation is imbecile, judicially to declare it a crime.

Those who oppose civil trials lest failure may result must oppose military trials for the same reason; they would shield traitors from all punishment.

"The President deems it expedient that Davis should first be put upon trial before a civil court."—Letter Secretary of War, January 4.

He knows the evidence of treason is undoubted; he may know the proof for a military offense, and tribunal is less ample.

I might prefer the military trial first, but we cannot control or dictate the order of proceeding.

The President demands a civil, not a military trial, and this is better than none. The forty rebellions in the last eight centuries of English history furnish abundant examples of civil trials, but not one of a military trial for treason or conspiracy merely. Mr. Bishop declares that a competent jury cannot be procured, but I affirm it can.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Burr's trial, referring to a case where there might be an "obvious impossibility of obtaining a jury whose minds were not already made up," as in a great rebellion, and speaking of the ordinary rule as to jurors, declared that in such case, "when this necessity exists, the rule perhaps must bend to it." And so jurors would be competent who could impartially try cases notwithstanding their opinions of general guilt against conspirators. Jurors generally will have no opinions as to the particular acts of treason which may be charged in an indictment; and a bill is now pending in the other end of this Capitol making jurors competent who can "impartially try the accused."

The marshal loyal, at least, under this Administration, may, by act of Congress of September 24, 1789, select a jury "from such parts of the district, [the whole State,] from time to time, as the court shall direct." (1 Stat. 88.)

By the act of Congress of June 17, 1862, the court may exclude all who have "adhered to any rebellion," since justice demands that treason should not be tried by traitors.

In the whole State of Virginia there are thousands of competent jurors, men who fled from rebellion and have since returned, besides northern citizens now there.

THE PRESIDENT WILL PUNISH TRAITORS.

Any citizen may volunteer advice to the President in relation to the execution of a civil sentence, and surely Congress may do as much. Enlightened history gives the precedent for this: (1 Howell's State Trials, 1190; 2 Strype's Annals, 134; 2 Ward's Law of Nations, 345; 11 State Trials, 807.)

But we tender no advice; we merely indorse the President's policy as declared by himself. In the Senate, March 2, 1861, the now President, then Senator, said:

"Show me who has been engaged in these conspiracies, who has fired upon our flag, who has given instructions to take our forts and custom-houses, and arsenals and dock-yards, and I will show you a traitor. Were I President of the United States, I would do as Thomas Jefferson did in 1806 with Aaron Burr. I would have them arrested; and, if convicted within the meaning and scope of the Constitution, by the Eternal God I would execute them."—Andrew Johnson, in the United States Senate, March 2, 1861; Congressional Globe, vol. 44, part 2, pages 1351-1354.

And this is but a repetition of what the great Commoner, Henry Clay, in the Senate in 1850, in speaking of Mr. Rhett, now infamously notorious, declared, when he said:

"If he pronounced a sentiment, attributed to him, of raising the standard of disunion and resistance to the common Government, whatever he has been, if he follows up the declaration by corresponding overt acts, he will be a traitor, and I hope he will meet the fate of a traitor."—16 Benton's Abridgment, 594.

Conventions and people in rebel States, and rebel sympathizing England, by her press and otherwise, have all been clamorous for pardon.

THE AMNESTY PROCLAMATION WISE.

The amnesty proclamation, in due time to be still more enlarged, presents an example of rare but wise magnanimity. But traitors alone should not dictate a policy that might restore Jefferson Davis to the Senate and to power. Let England be reminded of her own traditional policy, and be silent.

THE PRESIDENT INVITES THE ACTION OF CONGRESS AS TO TREASON.

But why should Congress resolve upon these questions? I answer, because the President invites our action on "the whole subject." His message tell us:

"That the circuit court of the United States would not be held in Virginia until Congress should have an opportunity to consider and act on the whole subject. To your deliberations the restoration of this branch of the civil authority of the United States is therefore necessarily referred."

And this he recommends, that civil trials may be had. When we make laws we must entertain if we do not express opinions on the purpose for which they are made. The punishment of treason is a great national question, not to be measured by ordinary rules in time of peace.

The President and almost every loyal Governor by message, and many of the courts in charges to grand juries, have declared that treason has been committed and should be punished, and these resolutions declare the same. They express no opinion as to individual guilt save only as to Jefferson Davis, and whoever would affect scruples of his crime must ignore all history, doubt the existence of the war, leap over the sublime to the ridiculous, and become himself a traitor, or lack the capacity to comprehend treason. We only affirm what Governors and courts and people and all history have declared.

Mr. Bishop says:

"In a case like that of Mr. Davis, the Government has, during four whole years, in every variety of form, pronounced, not that there was a violent suspicion against him, but that, absolutely, he was guilty; and, on this declaration, the Government has pledged its credit to lenders of money to an enormous extent, and cemented the declaration in the blood of thousands slain."—2 Criminal Law, sec. 1222.

We have a right to prescribe terms of reconstruction, and make punishment one of them. (3 Howard, U. S., 589; 16 Howard, 369; 1 Black, 436-474; 5 Elliot's Debates, 492, August 29, 1787.)

CONCILIATION.

Gentlemen may talk of conciliation. I, too, am in favor of speedily inaugurating the era of "peace on earth and good will to all men"—an era of universal brotherhood and universal justice.

IRREVERSIBLE GUARANTEES.

When by irreversible guarantees secession shall be repudiated; the supremacy of national allegiance and national adjudications affirmed; a just basis of representation in Congress and the Electoral College secured; the rebel debt repudiated, the impudent claim of compensation for slaves made free shall be rejected; our national debt and obligations to Union soldiers placed beyond repudiation; with the personal rights of every citizen secured; with every State pledged to provide common schools for all its youth, then, with unqualified loyalty restored, the era of fraternity will be secured. I do not say that all these are indispensable prerequisites of reconstruction, but unconditional loyalty is. Each State must be judged on its own merits, since some may be prepared for reconstruction before others.

THE GREAT CRIME OF REBELLION.

And now let us contemplate the magnitude of the crime which is to be dignified into respectability by exemption from punishment.

It was against a Government which Alexander H. Stephens in January, 1861, declared was—

"The best and freest Government, the most equal in its rights, the most just in its decisions, the most lenient in its measures, and the most aspiring in its principles to elevate the race of man that the sun of heaven ever shone upon."

And further:

"That no man could name one governmental act of wrong deliberately and purposely done by the Government of Washington of which the South has a right to complain."

Nor was this rebellion the work only of the misguided and unpretending masses, over whose erring but repentant steps, the mantle of charity is gently laid, with amnesty and pardon, blessing alike the donor and recipients.

But it was the work of men, some of whom, like Davis and Lee, had been educated at the public expense in the nation's Military Academy for the purpose of vindicating the Government against all its enemies, but who when warmed into life in its bosom, sought to inflict the sting of death in its heart by employing the military skill which was the nation's property to accomplish its overthrow.

It was the work of men, some of whom held seats in Buchanan's Cabinet, and there aided in disarming, plundering, and reducing to the verge of bankruptcy the Government they were bound by honor and by oath to protect.

It was the work of men, some of whom were intrusted with the power of legislation in both branches of Congress, who betrayed alike their trusts and their oaths to destroy the Constitution they had sworn to support.

It was the work of men, some of whom were high officers of the Army and Navy, nurtured with the nation's treasure, and intrusted with its power, who sundered the obligations of gratitude to their country, substituted perjury for patriotism, dishonor for duty, treachery for fidelity, and led the rebellion against the nation they had betrayed.

And then how great the crime in magnitude and character!

A gigantic rebellion waged for four years, carrying eleven States into the great revolt, supported by six millions of population, with immense armies incurring untold millions of debt, with the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives, carrying devastation over more than half the Republic, disturbing the social fabric, jeopardizing the peace of nations, imperiling our national existence, and threatening to sweep free government from among men.

ATROCIOUS VIOLATIONS OF THE LAWS OF WAR.

But treason, infamous and odious as is the crime, is no name for the atrocities perpetrated under its authority. The rebellion opened with meditated but averted assassination and culminated in its execution. Its progress has been marked with savage barbarities which set at defiance the laws of nations, and the usages of civilized warfare. Its history is replete with the evidence of this. The deliberate plot to assassinate Mr. Lincoln, the President-elect, in February, 1861; the "massacre of the soldiers of the Massachusetts sixth in Baltimore on the 19th of April," of the same year; the inhuman "butchery and wanton slaughter at Fort Pillow;" the revolting murder and "deliberate starvation of Union prisoners of war in the prisons and prison pens of the rebel States," at Libby and Belle Isle, Sausbury and Columbia, Charleston and Andersonville, in all which "more than fifty thousand were tortured to death by exposure and starvation or consigned to lingering and hopeless disease;" the burning of the city of Lawrence and the slaughter of its inhabitants; the murderous St. Albans raid and robbery; the plot to burn northern cities and spread pestilence through the land, with emissaries plotting conspiracy in the North—these are some of the crimes of the rebellion.

Finally, the crowning infamy of all this stupendous treason, planned by rebels in Canada, and approved in Richmond, culminated in that last great stab at the nation's life, the assassination of the late but now martyred President Lincoln at a time when his own sublime utterance had scarcely died away upon his lips, "With malice toward none, with charity for all." These have passed to the darkest and bloodiest page of history.

The monuments of this treason are everywhere apparent—in three thousand millions of debt to tax the energies of a generation; in half a million graves, with the wail of the widow and the orphan all over the land.

FRATERNITY, WITH LOYALTY AND FUTURE SECURITY.

But, for one, I will be content that all this shall slumber undisturbed in the quiet repose of history, and I will open no bleeding wound of the melancholy past, if with guarantees for peace and restored loyalty we can furnish an admonition to all future conspirators against the nation's life that infamy and death await them, so that when the ancient concord of our fathers shall be resumed it shall remain unbroken for our children and their posterity forever.

Sir Matthew Hale, who was justly styled "that solid philosopher;" that pillar and basis of justice, who would not have done an unjust act for any worldly price or motive; that practical Christian, the highest faculty of the soul of Westminster Hall, declared that—

"In criminals of blood, if the fact be evident, severity is justice;" "that in business capital, though my nature prompt me to pity, yet to consider that there is also a pity due to the country."

This nation does not demand severity, but justice on a smaller scale.

Booth and Mary E. Surratt and Wirz, mere subordinates of Davis, have paid the penalty. If the "great leader of the rebellion" himself, "the colossal traitor of the age," if he, Jefferson Davis, can escape all punishment, then is this age and nation and humanity itself loaded with infamy, dishonor, injustice, and disgrace forever.

General Grant, in his report of December 18, to the President, declares that the people of the South are not in a condition—

"To yield ready obedience to civil authority." * * * "This would render the presence of small garrisons throughout those States necessary."

The patriot soldier, General Schurz, in his report more than confirms this by declaring "their loyalty consists in submission to necessity," and so does the President by holding military possession of those States.

The rebel population have construed clemency into cowardice. The punishment of treason will aid in securing obedience to law and hasten reconstruction.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Many intelligent and philanthropic men are opposed to all capital punishment.

One among the most eminent of this class has forcibly said:

"For more than thirty years I have been an advocate of the abolition of the death penalty, and yet I am free to say that, measuring the Government not by my standard but by its own [its] duty to the country, requires that Jefferson Davis should be hung by the neck till he is dead. If he is not to be hanged, then in the name of humanity and of God, let us abolish the gallows forever, for no other man can be criminal enough to deserve hanging."

Let the nation, then, be generous yet just. Let us inscribe on the Constitution justice for all men. Let us "bind up the nation's wounds and do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STILWELL. Mr. Chairman, from the 14th day of April, 1861, when the American flag was fired on at Fort Sumter, until the surrender of General Lee and his whole army to General Grant, April 9, 1865, the people of eleven of the States of this Union were in armed rebellion against the national Government.

It was the proclaimed object of these people to cut the threads of national life, and sever the bonds of political Union.

It was the proclaimed object of the national Government to maintain its rightful authority over these States; to execute its laws and protect its flag over every foot of this widely extended territory; to mark and punish rebellion as a flagrant crime; and to bring back the deluded masses to a Union which for nearly eighty years had spread over them the mantle of peace and prosperity.

THE ISSUE.

That the public mind might be clearly informed of the issue involved; that no one might enter the army on either side under misapprehension; that when the battle was ended, and peace again restored, there should be no doubt or cavil in regard to the objects of the war, Congress, speaking in the name of the nation, passed, on the 23d of July, 1861, by a nearly unanimous vote, the following resolution:

"That this war is not prosecuted upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

ITS OBLIGATIONS.

There is not in the whole history of legislation an act of greater solemnity, or a contract more binding. Am I wrong in calling it a contract? Did it not pledge the national faith to every one in arms, that when he should capitulate, the rights of his State and of self-government should be preserved to his children and kindred, even though he might suffer the penalties of the law?

Did it not pledge the national faith to every Union man in the southern States, that, if he would stand fast to the Government, all his rights should be protected, and when peace should come, be fully restored to him? Did it not pledge the national faith to every man who enlisted in the service of his country, that no love of power, no lust of conquest, no military subjugation, should enter into the purposes of the war, but that it was waged merely to preserve, not to destroy Government?

Have not those in the southern States who have been true to their allegiance amid the most bitter persecutions known in the annals of history, who have seen their dwellings burned and their fields desolated, and who have fled to their mountains for refuge, and raised the flag on their summits, no claim to the fulfillment of this pledge? Have those at the North, who rushed to the battle-field to preserve national unity and restore national fraternity, no right to insist on the fulfillment of this pledge, without which they would have remained at home? Has not the nation itself a right to demand on this floor, and everywhere, that its plighted faith and its sacred honor, which have survived the storm of revolution, shall not perish in the halls of its own Capitol?

It is said, I know, that one Congress is not bound by the acts of a previous Congress, and that what was done in 1861 is not binding in 1866. Can this be so? Is the pledge of the national faith to pay money more binding than when it was made to preserve Government and protect liberty? Is the millionaire, who stays at home and lends his money, a more favored creditor of the nation than he who should his musket and goes to the field under the solemn pledge that State institutions should survive the shock of battle? National faith is essential to national life. It is the cementing bond of Union, the noblest attribute of government, and the virtue nearest allied to the great source of omniscient wisdom and justice.

This resolution adopted in the first year of President Lincoln's administration, shaped his policy and was the guide of his public life. All his acts had reference to it; under it he declared that to save the Union, (that is, to preserve the States,) was the first and great duty. To this everything was made subservient. If it could be done by protecting slavery, then slavery was to be protected. If it could best be done by destroying slavery, then slavery was to be destroyed. Hence, his administration was simple, straightforward, and consistent; and it is a matter of record that this policy received the unanimous support of his Cabinet.

His address to the people of Washington on the 13th of April, 1865, the last public act of his life, was the most studied, comprehensive, and perfect of the many papers which he has left for the instruction of posterity. It recapitulated all the principles laid down in the resolution, and gave to it a practical and tangible form. The system was perfect in all its parts, and complete in all its details. The time for practical application had come, and that application was about to be made by him, when the hand of the assassin deprived the nation of its head, the Constitution of its wisest defender, and the State governments of their truest friend.

By the action of our institutions the responsible duty of carrying out these measures devolved on the Vice President, Andrew Johnson. Here a wide field of ambition was opened to the new President. Armies were to be employed or disbanded; old States proscribed, or new ones brought into existence; the policy of the old Administration was to be continued, or a new policy adopted; and we all remember how the nation held its breath while these questions were under advisement.

At length the decree came forth that the policy of Abraham Lincoln was to be continued. That the resolution of July 23, 1861, which had formed the platform of the war, was also to be the platform of peace; and that those who had pinned their faith on the solemn declaration of Congress. were not to be disappointed.

The South immediately showed signs of national life. Industry, apparently dead, began to revive; confidence, which had been lost, returned with a bold step; and hope, which was about to expire, was again lighted up in the hearts of the people. The North felt that their labors had not been in vain; that they were again to have a whole country, a united country, and that the blood which had been shed on many battle-fields would but cement and preserve our Union.

Congress had laid down the rule. President Lincoln had interpreted it, and President Johnson accepted the interpretation and followed it. How earnestly he has labored to carry forward this great work; how many great difficulties have been interposed both North and South, to its final accomplishment; how party strife has at last come in unbidden, even in the hour of the nation's greatest peril, to thwart the holy purposes of union and fraternity, I need not stop to say. That the matured plans of President Lincoln, faithfully carried out by President Johnson, will finally be accepted by the American people, is my firm belief and earnest hope.

CONGRESS.

Since the opening of the session of Congress many new theories of reconstruction have been put forward. For the past four years the ingenuity of the legal profession has employed itself in demonstrating that the Union of the States is indissoluble; that the Constitution has conferred no power either on the Supreme Court, on Congress, on the several States, or on the people of the States to break the bonds of its authority and release the people from their allegiance. We had supposed this to be a political axiom. After four years of bitter strife we had hoped that the bond of our Union, after it had been bathed in the blood of a half million of patriots, would never again be called in question. But, Mr. Chairman, in this we are mistaken.

The argument of the gifted and eloquent gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLEBARGER,] delivered in this Hall on the 8th of January, goes to prove that there is a power within the Government which can destroy it, and that that power has been successfully exerted. He has labored to prove that a noble Union of thirty-six States has been shattered in pieces, and that eleven of those States, broken and dismembered, are now drifting on the billows of revolution like the hulks of a fleet disabled and scattered by the storm. And, sir, by what train of argument has he reached a conclusion so opposed to the national instinct and the convictions of the public judgment.

He has searched the law of nations to find the definition of a State, as it lives in the family of nations—an independent sovereignty, coequal, existing under certain conditions, and possessing certain attributes, and then, sir, has applied that definition to the States of our Union—the States of a constitutional Government, in which each derives its characteristics and its attributes not from the law of nations, but from a written Constitution defining and limiting the powers of each and all, and marking with accuracy their joint and several duties and their mutual relations. His whole argument, based on his definition of a State, therefore falls to the ground, for the argument can apply only to what is covered by the definition, and hence is entirely inapplicable to States as they exist under our form of government.

ADMISSION OF STATES AND TREASON.

The gentleman from Ohio has bestowed much learning and labor on the question of admitting States into the Union, and has pointed out very clearly the antecedent conditions of such admission. But, sir, does all this show that the rights which are conferred by admission can be forfeited afterward? Does it show that a State can go out of the Union as well as into it?

"Treason against the United States shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."—Constitution, art. 3, sec. 3.

Does this apply to individuals or to States? The next paragraph answers the question:

"No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Now, sir, the Constitution gives no definition of treason as applied to a State. It is the treason of the individual which the Constitution defines and for which it prescribes a punishment. This, sir, is both the letter and the spirit of the instrument. In neither a paragraph or a line of that instrument is there any allusion to the expulsion or punishment of a State. The person or individual is alone referred to, and the State, as such, is in no wise held responsible. The Government has retained, in its own hands, the power and right to punish treason. Having done this, would it be just to hold a State responsible when its citizens commit treason. Can Congress impose such responsibility?

WHAT THE CONSTITUTION GUARANTEES.

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."—Constitution, art. 4, sec. 4.

Now, sir, what does this article of the Constitution guaranty? A republican form of government. To whom does it guaranty it? To every State in this Union. Does it guaranty it to States out of the Union? Certainly not. This power, therefore, can only be exercised by Congress over States in the Union, and not over States out of it. In fact, sir, the Constitution never contemplated the case of a State going out, or being out, of the Union. Gentlemen on this floor have labored, with much astuteness and learning, to show how a State may go out of the Union; and that, under their way, eleven of the States have actually gone out.

I beg leave to remind those gentlemen, with great respect, that although the mode is somewhat novel, the principle itself is not new. It is the same principle which first appeared in the celebrated resolutions of 1798, which was revived under the name of nullification by John C. Calhoun in 1830, and culminated in secession in 1861. It is the same vicious principle which has seduced the hearts of a portion of our people from their allegiance to government, which has trampled on our flag, which has bathed our land in blood and filled our homes with mourning. I had hoped, sir, that four years of war, and such a war, had wiped out forever from the public mind every thought of nullification, secession, and disunion, and that we had emerged from the bloody contest with but one national pulsation, that the States "are one and inseparable, now and forever."

The gentleman from Ohio has been at great pains to show that the Government has a right to treat every individual of a State that has been in rebellion as a public enemy; that is, adjudge him guilty of treason and deprive him of citizenship, while the Constitution expressly provides that "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

What, Mr. Chairman, would be the practical operation of this new doctrine of constructive treason; of declaring that whenever by fraud or violence a State government should be interrupted or overthrown the whole people within its borders, as a body, should be treated as public enemies and beyond the protection of the General Government. Would it not at once transfer the allegiance of every citizen from the national to the State government, and effectually destroy our entire system? When the storms of tumult and civil discord should rage, would the affrighted citizen fly to the flag of his country only to be told that his State had rebelled and that he himself was a traitor? What nerved the arms and inspired the hearts of so many true patriots in the South during the recent struggle? It was the conviction that citizenship could only be lost by individual acts and not forfeited by the acts of others. It was the conviction that the air they breathed was the atmosphere of the whole nation, and that when the storm had passed it would again be pure, invigorating, and peaceful.

I know of no people, in any age or country, who adhered to their allegiance with greater fidelity, met danger with more determined bravery, who offered up their lives more cheerfully, and bore the flag of their country through fiercer storms than the Union men of the South. Andrew Johnson, in a speech to the people of Knoxville, thus describes their condition:

"My countrymen! my heart yearns toward you, and I am one of you. I have climbed yonder mountains, rock-ribbed and glowing in sunshine, in whose gorges, in whose caverns your sons, hunted like beasts, have fallen to rise no more. I do not speak of these things to draw your tears. It is not the time for tears, but for blows. I speak of them that I may fit your arms for unconquerable fight. And I speak of them because the mountain seems to talk to me. My house is among the mountains, and, though it is not far away, I cannot go to it. It is the place where I met and loved her who is the mother of my children. Do I not love the mountains? And if liberty is to expire, if freedom is to be destroyed, if my country in all its length and breadth is to tremble beneath the oppressor's tread, let the flag, the dear old flag, the last flag, be planted on yon rocky heights, and upon it let there be this inscription: 'Here is the end of all that is dear to the heart and sacred to the memory of man!'"

The doctrine of the gentleman from Ohio treats these men as public enemies, and deems them to have forfeited their political rights. And indeed, sir, his doctrine has received some sanction from the action of the House itself. The time, however, must come, and that soon, when we shall be brought face to face on all these great questions. We must decide whether those who were members of Congress during the most critical period of the rebellion, (including the President himself,) who went home and encountered all its furies, and have come back with certificates of election, are to be admitted, or are to be shot down, as rebels, at the door of the Capitol, not by the bullets of the enemy, but by the votes of Congress.

WHEN REPRESENTATIVES SHOULD BE ADMITTED.

Immediately after the military surrender of the rebel armies, the President had to accept the civil surrender of the people. The session of Congress had just terminated, and they would not reassemble until December. The Cabinet the legal advisers of Mr. Lincoln, were at their posts, and the President solicited their counsel and aid. All that Congress had asked, as conditions precedent to reconstruction, was the adoption of the constitutional amendments which they had passed. I think it must be admitted that after these had been accepted, in good faith, no subsequent conditions could justly be imposed. The President, however, acting in the true spirit that had governed his predecessors, went even beyond what he or Congress had asked, and suggested to the southern people that they would best promote the common interests of all by adding to the conditions which Congress had prescribed the utter repudiation of the confederate debt in all its forms, and a full guarantee to the African race of entire equality with the whites in all matters affecting personal liberty and civil rights.

My sentiments on these matters are fully stated in the following resolution which I had the honor of presenting to this House on the 19th day of December:

"Resolved, That when the people who have been in rebellion against the Government have submitted to the laws of the United States, adopted a republican form of government, repealed the ordinance of secession, passed the constitutional amendment forever abolishing slavery, repudiated the rebel war debt, and passed laws protecting the freedman in his liberty; the representatives of those people elected to Congress, and having received their certificates of election from their respective Governors, should be received as members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress when they shall take the oath prescribed by the last Congress, known as the test oath, without delay."

Under such conditions, when they are complied with in good faith, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to vote for the admission immediately of all loyal men who come here and take the prescribed oath that "they have never voluntarily assisted in the rebellion." What power, sir, has a right to exclude such representatives? If the rights of one man cannot be taken away by the misconduct of another, the loyal citizens of every State of this Union have an equal right to be represented here. And when, sir, the subject has been fully considered, I feel that that right will be cheerfully and speedily accorded.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Are there not, Mr. Chairman, strong motives arising out of our foreign relations, that should urge us to, harmony, fraternity, and union? Without these, we can never be great, we can never be strong. No sooner had the echo of the first gun fired at Sumter reached the British isle, than the old lion shook the dew-drops from his mane and began to growl. During the entire struggle, a rumbling sound ran through the entire British empire, indicating a wish to strike us if the happy moment should arrive. Privateers were fitted out under the very eye of the Government to prey upon our commerce; insulting paragraphs appeared in all their public journals; protection and sympathy were extended to rebels by public meetings and on all public occasions, and we were indebted for the preservation of peace to our great strength and the bravery of our troops in the field. France, our ancient ally, and who went with us, side by side, through the Revolution, also sought to profit by our misfortunes, and sent an army to Mexico to overturn a sister republic and establish there a monarchy, in direct hostility to the policy of our Government, proclaimed to the world forty years ago and followed implicitly by every Administration to the present time. Now, sir, with a knowledge of these facts, indicating a settled purpose abroad to profit by our divisions at home, is it wise to foment civil discord and divide in interest and sentiment this great nation, which should be bound together by all the ties which can unite a people?

OUR FINANCES.

The finances of a nation are alike the evidences of its greatness and the foundations of its power. No subject engages so earnestly the attention of a statesman as how to make labor most useful and productive. The southern States are capable of producing at the present moment, by a rightly adjusted system of labor, four million bales of cotton per annum, which at present prices would be worth $800,000,000; add to this $100,000,000 for rice and tobacco, and we have an annual amount, at present prices, for three articles alone, of one third of our entire national debt. Now, Mr. Chairman, instead of bringing these people back into the Union, encouraging and developing their industry, making them again a part of the Government and obliging them to contribute their full share in the payment of the national debt, there are gentlemen on this floor who would expend $50,000,000 annually for the poor gratification of keeping them out of the Union for four years longer. We have been fighting for four years to bring them back into the Union. And how, sir, is this $50,000,000 to be furnished? It is to be collected by the tax-gatherer from the honest laborer of the North. Is it worth while to sacrifice so much for passion and resentment? Is it not better to calm sectional strife, to heal the wounds of the nation, to absorb in the current of a healthy public sentiment the disloyalty which yet bursts from a few hearts as the mighty river carries the little rills which issue from the mountain side?

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

In regard to the subject of the elective franchise, I agree with the President in his message, which says:

"When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise."

I heartily concur in the above, and believe that the regulation of the elective franchise in all the States, and the qualifications of electors belong to the States each for itself, and are subjects in which Congress, under the Constitution, has no right to interfere; the policy of the President on this, as well as on many other subjects, was to preserve the Government as he found it, and not to make a new one, the Constitution of the United States having referred the matter of suffrage to the States, and invested them with the exclusive power over it, and it was not competent for the President to interfere with a prerogative so expressly conferred upon them, and so long exercised by them.

I will not, Mr. Chairman, pursue this subject further. I rejoice in the great good which the recent contest has produced. I hope we may reap all its legitimate fruits. I hope it will make us a great and united people, with one language, one heart, one destiny. I rejoice, sir, that the African race has risen to the condition of freedom. In the dispensations of Providence the nation laid its hands on the bowed captives and they sprang to the dignity of freedom. It touched their sightless eyes and they opened to the morning light of perpetual liberty. At the beginning of the contest they appeared to be the orphans of Providence; at its close they are the wards of the Republic. Under Providence, the guiding legislation of Congress, and the wisdom and justice of those whom they live among, they are now to go forward to their final destiny. Starting as men, with perfect equality before the law, they will soon become an important part of the body politic. Time will wear away prejudice and soon reconcile all parties to the new condition of things.

Mr. Chairman, I am hopeful of the future. The Constitution, as it stands, is the bond of perfect union and the guarantee of innumerable blessings to this people. Under it we have grown to be a great and powerful nation. It seems to me to embrace within its ample folds every State and every individual of each State, whether he be rebel or loyal; and that it has full power to punish the one and protect the other. I hope, sir, that in settling the grave question before us we shall keep ourselves within the bounds of this great charter of our liberties, and that no considerations of party advantage or political power will swerve us from the line of duty at a moment so critical. If this be so the future presents no difficulties. The eleven eclipsed stars will pass from under the shadows which now obscure them, and return to the pure light of a restored and happy Union.

And then, on motion of Mr. VOORHEES, (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 12, 1865, information in regard to the seizure of property, for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, belonging to A. Rhombert & Co., of Dubuque, Iowa; which, on motion of Mr. GRIMES, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of New England, praying that in the passage of all bills establishing a new basis of representation there be no distinction on account of race, color, or sex; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of an appropriation for the extension of the surveys of the public lands to the one hundredth meridian of longitude; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of an appropriation for the erection at the capital of that State of a building for the accommodation of the United States courts and post office; which were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART presented the memorial of Wellington & Dorsey, of the State of Nevada, praying for the passage of a law by Congress to authorize the Postmaster General to pay them additional compensation for the performance of extra mail service rendered in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Beals & Dixon, of New York, praying for legislation deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury for the adjustment and payment of their accounts under a contract for supplying the granite for the construction of the extension of the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON presented two petitions of citizens of New England, praying that in the passage of all bills establishing a new basis of representation there be no distinction on account of race, color, or sex; which were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the tax on sales of agricultural implements and for a removal of the tax which is now assessed upon castings made by themselves for their own machines; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of James Bawden, praying for the enactment of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to him for certain lands at Eagle Harbor, Lake Superior, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the expediency of appropriating $100,000 for the erection of a court-house and post office at Topeka, in the State of Kansas, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Pike county, Missouri, praying for the passage of an act for the appointment of properly qualified local engineers for each county or district, whose duties it shall be to examine and decide upon the qualifications of each and every person in their district desiring to act as engineers and to have charge and control of the steam works in any mill or manufacturing establishment, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the committee believing it to be a local State matter with which Congress has nothing to do.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution instructing them to inquire into the manner in which American vessels, transferred during the rebellion to British owners, are now being refurnished with American registers, have directed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, inasmuch as the House of Representatives have passed a bill which covers the ground.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 204) to regulate the registering of American vessels, which is the bill to which I have just alluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are still in order.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 84) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Freedmen's Saving and Trust Company," approved March 3, 1865, reported adversely thereon, and moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, recommending an appropriation toward providing for the compensation of a diplomatic agent of the United States at the Dominican republic, reported a bill (S. No. 130) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint a diplomatic representative to the republic of Dominica; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 36) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 5th of August, 1864.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (H. R. No. 36) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and additional appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

REFERENCE OF PAPERS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the resolutions of the Legislature of Nevada in favor of a grant of lands and money to aid in the construction of the San Francisco and Washoe railroad and the Placerville and Sacramento railroad, which were presented on the 31st of January, be taken up and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, bills for that purpose being before that committee, introduced since that period.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Committee on Public Lands be excused from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 129) for the relief of the heirs of James Bawden, which I presented yesterday, and that it go, together with the papers in the case, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY SUPPLIES IN DISLOYAL STATES.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary are hereby instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of making provision by law for the auditing and payment of the claims of loyal citizens of the States lately in rebellion for quartermasters' stores or for subsistence actually furnished to the Army of the United States, and receipted for by the proper officers receiving the same, or which may have been taken by such officers without giving such receipt, so as to place said claims on an equal footing with the same character of claims for stores and subsistence furnished by loyal citizens of States not in rebellion as provided in an act of Congress entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864.

I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment or two while I submit a few remarks in relation to this resolution. It may perhaps be within the recollection of the Senate that some time ago I introduced a bill amending the act named in the resolution, which bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill, in its second section, reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all claims of loyal citizens for quartermasters' stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States, and receipted for by the proper officer receiving the same, or which may have been taken by such officers without giving such receipt, may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proofs as each claimant can present of the facts in his case; and it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster General to cause such claim to be examined, and, if convinced that it is just, and of the loyalty of the claimant, and that the stores have been actually received or taken for the use of and used by said Army, then to report each case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, with a recommendation for settlement.

The third section of that bill was in the same words, except that it referred proofs of claims for subsistence supplies to the Commissary General. That committee, I perceive, has reported that bill back to the Senate adversely; and, as I understand, one of the controlling reasons influencing that committee in that determination was the fact that they supposed such claims would be so numerous as to impose a duty upon the officers specified in the bill so onerous that they could not satisfactorily discharge it; that at least it would interfere with the various duties already imposed upon those officers.

I hope, Mr. President, that no other reason constrained the committee to come to that conclusion; for, allow me to ask in a very few words, why the claim of a loyal man in a disloyal State for quartermasters' stores or subsistence supplies actually furnished to the Army of the United States, and actually used by the Army of the United States, is upon any other condition or in any other wise not equal in its demands upon the justice of Congress to a similar claim upon the part of a loyal citizen in a loyal State? It is to be presumed that these supplies were necessary, and the fact is, that they were always given at a time when they were peculiarly necessary. They were furnished to our armies far away from the base of supplies, where it was impossible to furnish them with the necessary supplies from the loyal States, and these loyal men were glad no doubt to have an opportunity, when their eyes were gladdened by the return of their old flag and by the sight of the forces of the Union, to render the aid and assistance which these supplies did actually give to the troops in our service. I demand to know, sir, upon what principle of justice or of propriety a loyal man coming to Congress with such a claim for compensation is to be rejected and his claim denied, when a man no more loyal than he is from the loyal States comes with his claim, and it is entertained and paid? What is the justice in the one case that does not apply in the other? What obligation is there resting upon Congress to pay for supplies actually furnished by a loyal man in a loyal State, that does not apply with equal, nay, sir, with greater force for the payment of supplies furnished by a loyal man in a disloyal State?

Mr. President, have you ever seen—no, sir, you have never seen—the loyal resident of a disloyal State during the late four years of terrible rebellion at his home surrounded by the enemies that surround him. Secure in your own northern home, surrounded by friends, protected in the enjoyment of all your civil rights by the laws which were in force around you, you have never seen and you have never felt the difficulties that surrounded the loyal men amid the persecutions and fires of persecution that afflicted them in the southern States. Sir, the danger for you was to be disloyal. Loyalty in your States was cause of no disability or detriment to your pursuits or to your interests. But how was it in the case of the men who furnished the supplies referred to in the resolution which I have had the honor to offer? Look at the loyal men in a southern State in their homes during these four years of terrible rebellion. Look at their condition. For the nights of these long four years these men never laid their heads upon their pillows, except under terrible apprehensions of personal violence before they awoke in the morning. Not an hour came to them that did not bring with it fears of distress and interruption in their pursuits. They never sowed knowing whether they would reap the reward of their own toil, and they never reaped with any assurance that they were to enjoy the fruits of their own labor; and worse than all this, and more difficult to be endured was the fact that wherever they went in the midst of those who had heretofore been their friends, "the slow, unmoving finger of scorn" and contempt was pointed at them. And yet in the midst of all these trials and difficulties, when our forces occasionally found their way to their homesteads, and they were gladdened by the sight of the flag of their fathers, they willingly divided the small pittance that rebel oppression and rebel pillage and rebel persecution had left to them with our forces. They foraged our horses, they fed our famishing soldiers; and yet when they come here to ask compensation from Congress for services rendered under these circumstances, when they come here from the midst of the desolation and distress which their own loyalty to our flag has brought upon themselves and families, not as pensioners, not asking for the charity of Congress, but with a legal demand asking payment for value received, they are spurned from the Halls of Congress as if they were mendicants or rebels. No wonder, sir, that the cry comes from all over the southern States from Union men, "It were better for us if we had been rebels, then our property would have been protected, then our houses would have been left to us." But now when the war is over and victory has brought peace to us again, and throughout the length and breadth of our country our flag is still floating in supremacy; when they come under these circumstances, they are regarded in a light no better than the rebels themselves.

Sir, do we expect to rally a Union party in the South if we thus treat the just demands of the Union men? Is it any wonder that this cry comes to Congress? Are these Union men to be treated as rebels and no more? Is there any less justice in the claims which they present to Congress here for supplies actually furnished in carrying on the war than in the claims for supplies furnished by loyal men in the loyal States? Is this justice? I understand that one cause for reporting adversely to this bill was the apprehension that the claims would be so numerous and the burden of debt incurred would be so great that, under the existing circumstances of the country, we could not well meet the obligation. Sir, there is a great mistake in regard to that matter. Unfortunately—yes, sir, I say unfortunately—the number of these claims is but too small for the credit of the country; but small or great, and whether the country is able or unable, whatever may be its ability or disability to meet these just claims, the country can better afford to meet them, at least to assume the obligation to pay them at some time, than it can afford to reject them.

Sir, the character of this country is worth more than the few million dollars of debt that would be incurred by a recognition of these claims; and allow me to say that in my humble opinion, if the Congress of the United States rejects them, it will affix a stain upon the national escutcheon that no succession of years will ever be able to wipe away, and when the pen of the future historian writes the terrible character of this rebellion, its work will not be done; the ingratitude of Congress to the loyal men who have stood true to the flag during all these terrible years in the South will also demand some black lines to be inscribed upon the history of our country, in the chapter which shall record the incidents of this rebellion.

I trust that the Senate will allow this resolution to be referred, and I trust moreover that the Committee on the Judiciary will consider the matter, and will report some plan of relief for these noble men, these noble Romans, these men whom no persecution, no distress, no scorn, no contempt, no ostracism, nothing that the ingenuity of malice and rebellion could invent to traduce and destroy them, could overcome their fidelity to the flag, and they stand to-day as shining lights in a dark land, attesting their devotion to their country, and only asking that their just demands on the Government may be placed on an equal footing with the same character of demands on the other side of the line.

Mr. CLARK. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia, but I desire to suggest to him that the better reference would be the Committee on Military Affairs, unless he has some particular preference in regard to committees. The Committee on Military Affairs naturally have more knowledge on this subject than the Judiciary Committee, from their familiarity with the business.

Mr. WILLEY. Perhaps the Senator did not hear me when I remarked that a bill for the amendment of the law now existing, looking to the accomplishment of this same object, has already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they have reported adversely, and indeed I offered this resolution proposing an inquiry by the Judiciary Committee, on the suggestion of a member of the Military Committee. It is a matter altogether immaterial to me to what committee it shall go; but I hope that to whatever committee the proposition may be referred, it will command the approbation of the committee, and that justice will be done to the claims of these persons.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When this matter was before the Military Committee it was referred to me to look into as a member of the committee, and I made some inquiries on the subject. The bill as proposed conferred upon the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General the power to hear and determine these claims throughout not only the loyal States, as they are called, but the States wherein the rebellion had existed. From information which I received from the Commissary General and the Quartermaster General, and also at the War Department, I became satisfied that the cases which had already been thrown upon those Departments, and upon which they have been called on to act, have been so embarrassing and so numerous already that it was impossible for the officers at the head of those bureaus to give their personal attention and upon their personal responsibility to assume the duty of hearing and determining these claims; and it was deemed altogether unwise and dangerous to throw upon a bureau a vast number of cases to be heard and decided when the head of the bureau must of necessity trust the decision to mere clerks in the department under him, and that therefore it was necessary that some other tribunal should be created (if the Court of Claims itself is not empowered to hear and determine these claims) where both sides could be heard; where the party claiming damages upon the ground of his loyalty could appear, and where the Government could also appear to cross-examine the witnesses and investigate the claim, so as to know that the Government was not to be imposed upon by mere ex parte statements coming here from all that section of country over which our Army traversed, for supplies furnished to the Army, or pretended to be furnished to the Army. Persons will, as a matter of course, be tempted to assert their loyalty, and perhaps produce some evidence to show their loyalty in the absence of any one appearing for the Government. We should thus open a door into our Treasury which would take from it hundreds upon hundreds of millions; and therefore it was that the committee, upon my reporting the facts, were satisfied that this duty should not be imposed upon these branches of the War Department.

It is true, as my honorable friend from West Virginia has stated, that I suggested to him that it would be a proper matter to be considered by the Judiciary Committee whether any tribunal ought to be created, and how it should be created, so that these claims would actually be heard, and both sides be heard and properly passed upon with safety to the Government, and yet without doing injustice to the claimants. That was the ground substantially upon which the Committee on Military Affairs acted and upon which they instructed me to make the report.

Mr. WILLEY. I certainly would be the last person in the world to initiate a policy by which the Government would be imposed upon, or by which claims presented by men who had not been loyal to the United States should be entertained and paid; but allow me by way of illustrating the propriety of some action in the case, just to read an account furnished by one of these men, received by me a day or two ago:

THE UNITED STATES

for (45) forty-five bushels of oats @ 60.....$27 00
" (45) forty-five bushels of rye @ $1 25..... 56 25

Eighty-three and 25-100 dollars.

I certify that the above account is just and correct, and that the articles so purchased are for public horses attached to my command, and that the same will be issued to the ration allowance, and that I cannot pay for the same for the want of funds.

H. F. HYMAN,
Captain Battery I, 1st regiment, Co. A, O. V., U. S. A.
CALIFASTER VALLEY, May 4, 1862.

I understand that this old man Rhine furnished not only these goods and others at various times to our forces, but furnished two loyal sons to the United States Army, one of whom, in evidence of his devotion, sleeps in southern soil, where he fell fighting bravely for his flag. When such a man—and there are many such—comes to the Congress of the United States simply asking payment for the supplies actually furnished to the United States, he should be placed upon an equal footing with a loyal man in a loyal State for such supplies furnished; and I think it would be exceedingly hard to reject the applications of such men, and to say that they are no better than the rebels among whom they lived.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to this resolution going to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported against the proposition submitted to them as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I hold in my hand a bill prepared several days ago to repeal the law which authorized the Quartermaster General and the Commissary General to settle any of these accounts, and after action upon this resolution I propose to introduce that bill, and have it referred to the Military Committee. If the Committee on the Judiciary can devise any proper way, with proper guards, for entering upon the investigation and settlement of these demands, I should be very glad to support it; but I see plainly that hundreds of millions of dollars are to be called for from this Government to pay for damages and claims of various kinds and descriptions from the rebellious section of the country.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator will observe that this does not apply to damages or anything of the kind.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that this proposition does not go to that extent; but I wish to say here now that I am opposed to paying one dollar for the damages occasioned by our armies or inflicted upon the people of the rebel States by our armies. I am opposed to it now, and I intend to oppose it so long as I have a seat in this body. Wherever we have taken property and used it for our armies and given receipts for it, I will fulfill the contract. We ought to do it. In those cases the parties ought to have their pay and have it promptly, and I suppose there are several such cases; but as to damages occasioned by the movements of our armies, or inflicted by our armies, I am opposed to payment now, and intend to oppose it to the end. The inhabitants of the States in rebellion must take the consequences of war and not inflict upon the people of this country the burden of having to pay for damages made necessary in order to subdue their rebellion.

I am perfectly willing that this resolution shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I hope that committee will be able to devise some means by which the people of the loyal and disloyal States who have actually furnished supplies for our Army and have received receipts for the same shall obtain their pay as soon as possible. I do not, therefore, oppose the reference.

Mr. CLARK. I do not rise so much to talk to the resolution precisely as I do to comment on the remarks which have fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts. I cannot give my assent to them. It is the duty of this Government to be just, whether it has given a receipt or not. It is just as much the duty of this Government to pay for a house of a loyal man destroyed in West Virginia as it is to pay for the duck or the guns of a citizen of Massachusetts or a northern loyal State. The question is not where the man lives, but what service he has rendered your Government, or what you have taken from him which you ought to replace; and it will not do, in my judgment, for this Government blindly to say, "We will do this, and we will not do the other thing, even if we judge it to be right." The Government is to do right wherever the citizen may live who claims that it ought to do right. If the Government owes him a debt it ought to discharge it.

Sir, it is one of the things that we fought for, that we would hold the whole of this country under the jurisdiction of the national Government, and it must result from that, that we must be just to every citizen of that Government, wherever he resides. We have not fought to pay the citizens of the loyal States and turn the citizens of the disloyal States, if they have been true, out of doors or from under the Government's protection. We owe it to them all, and we owe it even more, if it can be possible, to those men who have stood true in this rage of rebellion and amid the rebels than we do to those of us who have not had that temptation. Sir, we never can know what those men have suffered. "Why," said a loyal man from Mississippi to me the other day, "I have known some of my neighbors to have lived two years in the woods, and never once gone home, because they would not be untrue or faithless to the Government." If such men have suffered losses and you have taken their property, shall you not pay them as well as a man who slept in his house every night and never was turned out, who never made any sacrifice except in the tax he has paid to the Government? Why, sir, it would be a reproach and a shame if we should acknowledge and act upon any such premises or foundation.

No, sir, we must be just; and let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts you have got to tax the people heavily and they will bear it if you are just; but if you are unjust, they will not bear it. Your Government must go upon its justice. Your people sustained you in putting down the rebellion. They will sustain you in being just to every citizen of the Government whom you owe, whatever may be the tax or the obligation imposed upon them. I would be careful, I would scrutinize; I never would pay a rebel a farthing except to buy him a rope; but where a man has been true, whether he lived in a loyal State or among rebels, I would be true to him. I would not exact faith and allegiance from him, and then turn him away from the door. Stand by the citizen, and the citizen will stand by you.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am not surprised at the earnest manner in which the Senator from New Hampshire has spoken. After having brought into this Senate and advocated paying for a building used by the rebels as an observatory to see the movements of our armies, I am not at all surprised at it. I say to that Senator if we are to pay the damages occasioned by the movements of our armies, hundreds of millions of dollars will be taken out of the public Treasury and put upon the people who fought the battles of this country. I will not vote a dollar of it.

The Senator talks about law. There is no law for it. We are asked to make a law for it. I am opposed to making a law for any such thing. I am opposed to paying the damages which our armies occasioned or inflicted. Are we to pay for the property destroyed by the march of Sherman's army from Atlanta to Savannah and from Savannah to North Carolina? Are we to pay for Phil Sheridan's destruction of property in the Shenandoah valley by the order of General Grant? We have destroyed millions and millions of property by our military movements. Are men to come here now and tell us that they were loyal, and are the people of this country to be taxed to pay those men for the destruction occasioned or inflicted by our armies? Where is the law for it? The Senator says we are bound to do it by law. Where? Who made such a law and when was such a law made? No, sir, they want us to make a law of that character. I shall not vote for it. Thousands of men in this country have lost their all by the war. Are we to pay the merchants of New York, of Philadelphia, and of Boston for the losses occasioned by the war? Are we to pay them for their ships lost on the seas? Where are we to begin and where are we to stop?

I said in regard to the proposition made by the Senator from West Virginia that I was willing to pay loyal people who had furnished supplies for our Army, whether they lived in the loyal or the disloyal States. I am willing to treat one just as I will treat the other. Where we have given certificates that we have taken property there, I hold those certificates to be a contract; and if in some cases it can be clearly shown that the officers of our Army took property for the support of the Army, and that circumstances prevented their giving the proper vouchers for it, I am willing, on a most thorough and exact investigation, to pay for that property. But are we to pay for the thousands of dwellings burnt, for the miles of fence burnt up, for the vast amount of property destroyed by the march of our armies? Sir, all this was occasioned by the war; it was a part of the necessary loss brought upon the people by the movements of our armies, and I am not in favor of paying for the wood we have cut down or the fences we have burnt, or the wheat fields trampled under the march of our armies, whether it be in the loyal or disloyal States. We have had burdens enough imposed on the people of this country for generations to come, without having thousands and hundreds of thousands of traitors professing to be loyal, coming up to Congress every year and asking us to pay for every little damage occasioned by the movements of our armies. I do not believe in the justice of it. I believe it to be a wrong, utterly indefensible, to put upon the men who have saved this country, to put upon the soldiers of our armies who have by the orders of their commanders, or by the movements of the armies, destroyed property in their marches, the burden of paying for the property destroyed.

Sir, we have had a touch of this. A bill was passed at the last session, which, by an act that I regard as almost providential, did not become a law. Had it become a law, and had that bill been taken as a precedent here, it was a vote of more than $500,000,000 out of the Treasury, and you had nowhere to stop without denying your own action. It is before us, and I trust in God it never is to pass, and that no such legislation is to receive the sanction of this nation that is to provide for the property destroyed by the movements of our armies.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is kind enough to say that he is not surprised at the course that I take. Let me tell that Senator that I am surprised at the course he takes. I was surprised to hear him say in the Senate yesterday, that he would not give a vote even if it were right. Now, sir, I never shall do that. Whatever may be the consequences, if I come to the conclusion that a thing is right to be done, I shall give my vote to do it; and so will the Senator from Massachusetts when he reflects. No man will do right more readily than he. It is only in his warmth and earnestness and zeal to save the country that he would be unjust to the citizens of the country by not discriminating between what ought to be done and what ought not to be done.

I am not afraid, Mr. President, to look these claims against the Government in the face. I have no idea that any large mass of them is to be paid. I have no idea that one in ten deserves to be paid among all the disloyal country; but if in those ten there is one to be paid, I will look after that one and rejoice that the one which was lost is saved and has not gone with the other nine. I do not believe, I will not believe, that the men who fought and marched from the loyal States to save your country will be unjust to the men who fought and marched from the disloyal States. I do not believe that the men in Massachusetts would sanction the principle that the men in West Virginia true to your flag should be turned away by the cold shoulder of the Government. Sir, the men living in New England not only have brave hearts but they have warm hearts, and they will extend the hand of fellowship to the true soldier, be he wherever he may be, or be he white or be he black. The question is not where he lives, as I said before; the question is what he has done and what is the heart that he bears within his bosom. The question is not whether he has got a receipt in his pocket; the question is whether the Government is under obligation to him and ought to discharge it.

The Senator refers to the act that we passed at the last session that was defeated by a mistake of the clerk. Can the Senator tell the principle on which that act went? Can he tell whether that principle would embrace one hundred or five hundred or only ten cases? I can tell him that the man who made that claim was as loyal as any man in all the country, and that you took his property as much as you ever took the property of any person in the necessities of war.

Mr. President, this Senate is too just, it has committed to it too vast interests ever to turn its back upon its citizens; it will draw no line along by the Potomac and thence between Kentucky and Tennessee away to the West; but this is the whole country, and the loyal citizens of the whole country are the citizens of your Government demanding your protection, and they must and ought to have it. They will have it, and by and by the broad mantle of your justice and your love will cover all this country, and we shall be in the end, I hope, not rebels and loyalists, but all true to the flag, and ever hereafter maintaining it.

The resolution was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before my friend from Massachusetts proceeds, I desire to submit an amendment which I shall offer to the pending resolution before the Senate by way of substitute, and I ask to have it printed and laid on our tables.

Mr. FESSENDEN and others. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE, which was to substitute for the article of amendment proposed by the House of Representatives the following:

After the census to be taken in the year 1870 and each succeeding census, Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male electors over twenty-one years of age qualified by the laws thereof to choose members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature. And direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situated in each State not belonging to the State or to the United States.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER concluded the speech which he began yesterday. To preserve the continuity of his argument, the speech is now published complete, as follows:

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I begin by expressing my acknowledgments to the Senator from Maine, who yields the floor to me to-day, and also my sincere regret that anything should interfere with the opening of this debate by him. It is his right, and I enter upon it now only by his indulgence.

I am not insensible to the responsibility which I assume in setting myself against a proposition already adopted in the other House, and having the recommendation of a committee to which the country looks with such just expectation, and to which, let me say, I look with so much trust. But after careful reflection, I do not feel that I can do otherwise. Knowing, as I do, the eminent character of the committee, its intelligence, its patriotism, and the moral instincts by which it is moved, I am at a loss to understand the origin of a proposition which seems to me nothing else than another Compromise of Human Rights, as if the country had not already paid enough in costly treasure and more costly blood for such compromises in the past. I had hoped that the day of compromise with wrong had passed forever. Ample experience shows that it is the least practical mode of settling questions involving moral principles. A moral principle cannot be compromised.

Here are the words of the amendment:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

I may be mistaken, sir, but I think it difficult to read this proposition without being painfully impressed by the discord and defilement which it will introduce into the Constitution, having among its specific objects the guarantee of a republican form of government. The discord is apparent on the face. The defilement is none the less apparent. Go back, if you please, to the adoption of the Constitution, and you will gratefully acknowledge that the finest saying of the times was when Madison, evidently inspired by the Declaration of Independence, and determined to keep the Constitution in harmony with it, insisted in well-known words, that "it was wrong to admit in the Constitution the idea of property in man." Of all that has come to us from that historic Convention, where Washington sat as President, and Franklin and Hamilton sat as members, there is nothing having so much of imperishable charm. It was wrong to admit in the Constitution the idea that man could hold property in man. Accordingly, in this spirit the Constitution was framed. This offensive idea was not admitted. The text at least was kept blameless. And now, after generations have passed, surrounded by the light of Christian truth and in the very blaze of Human Freedom, it is proposed to admit in the Constitution the twin idea of Inequality in Rights, and thus openly set at naught the first principles of the Declaration of Independence and the guarantee of a republican government itself, while you blot out a whole race politically. For some time we have been carefully expunging from the statute-book the word "white," and now it is proposed to insert in the Constitution itself a distinction of color. An amendment, according to the dictionaries, is "an improvement"—"a change for the better." Surely the present proposition is an amendment which like the crab goes backward.

Such is its appearance when you regard it merely in its form, without penetrating its substance; but here it is none the less offensive. The case is plain. There are among us four million citizens, now robbed of all share in the government of their country, while at the same time they are taxed according to their means, directly and indirectly, for the support of the Government. Nobody can question this statement. And this bare-faced tyranny of taxation without representation it is now proposed to recognize as not inconsistent with fundamental right and the guarantee of a republican government. Instead of blasting it you go forward to embrace it as an element of political power.

If, by this, you expect to induce the recent slave-master to confer the right of suffrage without distinction of color, you will find the proposition a delusion and a snare. He will do no such thing. Even the bribe you offer will not tempt him. If, on the other hand, you expect to accomplish a reduction of his political power, it is more than doubtful if you will succeed, while the means you employ are unworthy of our country. There are tricks and evasions possible, and the cunning slave-master will drive his coach and six through your amendment staffed with all his representatives. Should he cheat you in this matter, it will only be a proper return for the endeavor on your part to circumvent him at the expense of fellow-citizens to whom you are bound by every obligation of public faith.

I know not if others will see this uncertainty as I see it; but there are two practical consequences having a direct influence on the times, which all must see as following at once from the adoption of the so-called amendment. In the first place, it will be a present renunciation of all power under the Constitution to apply the remedy for a grievous wrong, when the remedy, even according to your own recent example, is actually in your hands. You have already in this Chamber, only last Friday, decreed civil rights without distinction of color. Who can doubt, that by the same title you may decree political rights also, without distinction of color? But, having the power, it is your duty to exercise it. You cannot evade this duty without becoming partakers in the wrong. And this brings me to the second practical consequence which must ensue from the adoption of this proposition. You will hand over wards and allies, through whom the Republic has been saved, and therefore our saviors, to the control of vindictive enemies, to be taxed and governed without their consent; and this you will do for a consideration "nominated in the bond," by virtue of which men may do a great wrong, provided they will submit as a quid pro quo to a proportionate abridgment of political power. Who does not admire the English patriot who once said that he would give his life to serve his country, but he would not do a mean thing to save it. I hope we may act in this spirit. Above all do not copy the example of Pontius Pilate, who surrendered the Saviour of the World, in whom he found no fault at all, to be scourged and crucified, while he set at large Barabbas, of whom the gospel says in simple words, "Now Barabbas was a robber."

I speak with a sincere deference for those valued friends from whom I differ; but I submit that the time has come at last when we should deal directly and not indirectly with the great question before us, and when all compromise of Human Rights should cease, and especially there should be no thought of a three-headed compromise, which, after degrading the Constitution, renounces a beneficent power essential to the safety of the Republic, and, lastly, borrowing an example from Pontius Pilate, turns over a whole race to sacrifice. These objections I now present briefly on the threshold, without argument, and I advance to the main question which must dominate this whole debate. By way of introduction I send to the Chair a counter-proposition, which I desire to have read.

The Secretary read the following joint resolution:

A joint resolution carrying out the guarantee of a republican form of government in the Constitution of the United States, and enforcing the constitutional amendment for the prohibition of slavery.

Whereas it is provided in the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government; and whereas by reason of the failure of certain States to maintain governments which Congress might recognize, it has become the duty of the United States, standing in the place of guarantor, where the principal has made a lapse, to secure to such States according to the requirement of the guarantee, governments republican in form; and whereas further, it is provided in a recent constitutional amendment that Congress may "enforce" the prohibition of slavery by "appropriate legislation," and it is important to this end, that all relics of slavery should be removed, including all distinction of rights on account of color: Now, therefore, to carry out the guarantee of a republican form of government and to enforce the prohibition of slavery, Be it resolved: That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be no Oligarchy, Aristocracy, Caste, or Monopoly invested with peculiar privileges and powers, and there shall be no denial of rights, civil or political, on account of color or race anywhere within the limits of the United States or the jurisdiction thereof; but all persons therein shall be equal before the law, whether in the court-room or at the ballot-box. And this statute, made in pursuance of the Constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, in opening this great question, I begin by expressing a heart-felt aspiration that the day may soon come, when the States lately in rebellion may be received again into the copartnership of political power and the full fellowship of the Union. But I see too well that it is vain to expect this day, which is so much longed for, until we have obtained that security for the future, which is found only in the Equal Rights of All, whether in the court-room or at the ballot-box. This is the Great Guarantee, without which all other guarantees will fail. This is the sole solution of our present troubles and anxieties. This is the only sufficient assurance of peace and reconciliation. To the establishment of this Great Guarantee, as a measure of safety and of justice, I now ask your best attention.

The powers of Congress over this subject are as ample as they are beneficent. From four specific fountains they flow—each one sufficient for the purpose—all four swelling into an irresistible current, and tending to one conclusion: first, the necessity of the case, by which, according to the analogies of the "Territories," disloyal States, having no local government, lapse under the authority of Congress; secondly, the Rights of War, which do not expire or lose their grasp, except with the establishment of all needful guarantees; thirdly, the constitutional injunction to guaranty a Republican Form of Government; and, fourthly, the constitutional amendment by which Congress, in words of peculiar energy, is empowered "to enforce" the abolition of slavery "by appropriate legislation." According to the proverb of Catholic Europe, all roads lead to Rome, and so do all these powers lead to the jurisdiction of Congress over this whole subject. No matter which road you take, you arrive at the same point. Two of these powers have already been discussed exhaustively. The latter have been less considered, and it is on these that I shall speak especially to-day. I propose, with the permission of the Senate, to show the necessity and duty of exercising the jurisdiction of Congress so as to secure that essential condition of a Republican Government, the Equal Rights of All. And I put aside, at the outset, the metaphysical question, worthy of the schoolmen in the dark ages, whether certain States are in the Union or out of the Union. This is a question of form and not of substance, of words only and not of facts; for the substance is clear and the facts are unanswerable. All are agreed, according to the authority of President Lincoln, in his latest utterance before his lamented death, that these States have ceased to be "in practical relations with the Union;" and this is enough to sustain the jurisdiction of Congress, even without the plain words of the Constitution in two separate texts.

Necessity and duty commingle. If what is necessary is not always according to duty, surely duty is always a necessity. On the present occasion they unite in one voice for the Great Guarantee. It is at once a necessity and a duty. Glancing at the promises of the fathers, I shall exhibit: first, the overruling necessity of the times; and secondly, the positive mandate of the Constitution, compelling us to guaranty "a republican form of government," and thus to determine what is meant by this requirement; all of which has been fortified by the constitutional amendment authorizing Congress to enforce the abolition of slavery.

PROMISES OF THE FATHERS.

In the life of a nation, as in that of an individual, there are special moments when outstanding promises must be performed under peril of ruin and dishonor. Such is the present moment in the life of our Republic. There are sacred promises beginning with our history yet unperformed, and now the hour has sounded when continued failure on our part will open the door to a long train of woes. And there are yet other promises recently made for the national defense against a wicked rebellion, which, like those of an earlier date, are unper-formed also. But the latter are all included in the former, so that our whole duty now centers in the performance of those sacred promises which are coeval with the national life.

Our fathers solemnly announced the Equal Rights of all men, and that Government had no just foundation except in the consent of the governed; and to the support of the Declaration, heralding these self-evident truths, they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. Looking at this Declaration now, it is chiefly memorable for the promises it then made. Mighty words! Fit utterance for the giant infant then born. Fit device for the great Republic taking its place in the family of kings. Fit lesson for mankind. And now the moment has come when these vows must be fulfilled to the letter. In securing the Equal Rights of the freedman, and his participation in the Government, which he is taxed to support, we shall perform those early promises of the Fathers, and at the same time the supplementary promises only recently made to the freedman as the condition of alliance and aid against the Rebellion. A failure to perform these promises is moral and political bankruptcy. It is repudiation of moral and political duties, ending in the repudiation of the financial obligations of the country. So are your duties to the national freedman linked with your obligations to the national creditor, that you cannot repudiate the former without impairing the value of the latter. Whoever disowns any of the promises of the Republic leads the way in repudiation.

But you cannot be thus guilty. Even, if indifferent to the vows of the Fathers, necessity, in harmony with the plain injunction of the Constitution, will constrain you. On this there can be no doubt. You must perform these promises, and this brings me to the overruling necessity of the times.

OVERRULING NECESSITY OF THE TIMES.

I. Necessity is a peremptory instructor. It gives the law which no man can disregard. It will not hearken to apology or postponement. With a voice of command it insists that its behests shall be obeyed. And now this very necessity speaks to us with familiar tones.

Twice already, since rebel Slavery rose against the Republic, it has spoken to us, insisting; first, that the slaves should be declared free; and secondly, that muskets should be put into their hands for the common defense. Yielding to necessity, these two things were done. Reason, humanity, justice were powerless in this behalf; but necessity was irresistible. And the result testifies how wisely the Republic acted. Without emancipation, followed by the arming of the slaves, rebel Slavery would not have been overcome. With these the victory was easy.

At last the same necessity, which insisted first upon emancipation and then upon the arming of the slaves, insists with the same unanswerable force upon the admission of the freedman to complete Equality before the law, so that there shall be no ban of color in court-room, or at the ballot-box, and government shall be fixed on its only rightful foundation—the consent of the governed. Reason, humanity, and justice, all of which are clear for this admission of the freedman, may fail to move you; but you must yield to necessity, which now requires that these promises shall be performed.

The demand which I now make stands on necessity. You must grant it, or you will peril the peace of this Republic, and postpone indefinitely the great day of security and reconciliation. Therefore, in the name of that national safety, which is the supreme law, I begin my appeal. Whatever is required for the national safety is constitutional. Not only it may be done, but it must be done. Not to do it is to fail in duty. This Republic must be saved.

When I speak of necessity, I mean that overruling compulsion which cannot be disobeyed. In the present case it is compounded of moral duty and the instinct of self-preservation. The moral duty to perform these promises is as plain as the decalogue. The instinct of self-preservation, impelling us to save the Republic, is in harmony with the requirements of moral duty. In denying justice now, you will not only be guilty of grievous wrong, but you will expose your country to incalculable calamity. The case is too clear for debate.

The irresistible argument for Emancipation was always twofold: first, its intrinsic justice, and secondly, its necessity for the safety of the Republic; all of which was expressed by President Lincoln in the closing words of his great Proclamation; when he said:

"And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God."

But the argument for Enfranchisement, which is nothing but the complement of Emancipation, is the same. Enfranchisement is not only intrinsically just, but it is necessary to the safety of the Republic. There is no reason, point, or suggestion once urged for Emancipation which may not be urged now for Enfranchisement. I shall not err if I say that Emancipation itself will fail without Enfranchisement.

By Enfranchisement I mean the establishment of the Equal Rights of All, so that there shall be no exclusion of any kind, civil or political, founded on color, and the promises of the Fathers shall be fulfilled. Such an act will be, in the words of President Lincoln, "an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity."

As an act of justice, Enfranchisement has a necessity of its own. No individual and no people can afford to be unjust. Such an offense will carry with it a curse, which, sooner or later, must drag its perpetrator to the earth. But here the necessity from considerations of justice is completed and intensified by the positive requirements of the national safety, plainly involved in the performance of these promises.

Look at the unhappy freedman blasted by the ban of exclusion. He has always been loyal, and now it is he and not the rebel master who pays the penalty. From the nature of the case, he must be discontented, restless, anxious, smarting with a sense of wrong and a consciousness of rights denied. He will not work as if taken by the hand and made to feel the grasp of friendship. He will be idle, thriftless, unproductive. Industry will suffer. Cotton will not grow. Commerce will not thrive. Credit will fail; nay, it will die before it is born. On the other hand, his rebel master, with hands still red with the blood of his fellow-countrymen, will be encouraged in that assumption of superiority which is a part of the Barbarism of Slavery; he will predominate as in times past; he will be exacting as of old; he will be harsh, cruel, and vindictive; he will make the unprotected and trembling freedman suffer for the losses and disappointments of the Rebellion; he will continue to insult and prostitute the wife and children who, in ceasing to be chattels, have not ceased to be dependents; he will follow the freedman to by-ways and to obscure places, where he will once again play the master and assert his ancient title as lord of the lash. Scenes of savage brutality and blood must ensue. All this, which reason foretells, the short experience of a few months already confirms. And all this you sanction, when you leave the freedman despoiled of his rights.

But the freedman, though forbearing and slow to anger, will not submit to outrage always. He will resist. Resistance will be organized. And here will begin the terrible war of races foreseen by Jefferson, where God, in all His attributes, has none which can take part with the oppressor. The tragedy of St. Domingo will be renewed on a wider theater, with bloodier incidents. Be warned, I entreat you, by this historic example. It was the denial of rights to colored people, after successive promises, which caused that fearful insurrection. After various vicissitudes, during which the rights of citizenship were conferred on free people of color and then resumed, the slaves at last rose, and here the soul sickens at the recital. Then came Toussaint L'Ouverture, a black of an-mixed blood, who placed himself at the head of his race, showing the genius of war, and the genius of statesmanship also. Under his magnanimous rule the beautiful island began to smile once more; agriculture revived; commerce took a new start; the whites were protected in person and property; and a constitution was adopted acknowledging the authority of France, but making no distinction on account of color or race. In an evil hour this policy was reversed by a decree of Napoleon Bonaparte. War revived, and the French army was compelled to succumb. The connection of St. Domingo with France was broken, and this island became a black republic. All this dreary catalogue of murder, battle, sorrow, and woe began in the denial of justice to the colored race. And only recently we have listened to a similar tragedy from Jamaica, thus swelling the terrible testimony. Like causes produce like effects; therefore, all this will be ours if we madly persist in the same denial of justice. The freedmen among us are not unlike the freedmen of St. Domingo or Jamaica; they have the same "organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions," and above all, the same sense of wrong, and the same revenge.

To avoid insurrection and servile war, big with measureless calamity, and even to obtain that security which is essential to industry, agriculture, commerce, and the national credit, you must perform the promises of the Republic, originally made by our fathers, and recently renewed by ourselves. But duty done will not only save you from calamity, and give you security; it will also prepare the way for all the triumphs of the future, when through assured peace there shall be tranquillity, prosperity, and reconciliation, all of which it is vain to expect without justice.

The freedman must be protected. To this you are specially pledged by the Proclamation of President Lincoln, which, after declaring him "free," promises to maintain this freedom, not for any limited period, but for all time. But this cannot be done so long as you deny him the shield of impartial laws. Let him be heard in court and let him vote. Let these rights be guarded sacredly. Beyond even the shield of impartial laws, he will then have that protection which comes from the consciousness of manhood. Clad in the full panoply of citizenship he will feel at last that he is a man. At present he is only a recent chattel, awaiting your justice to be transmuted into manhood. If you would have him respected in his rights, you must begin by respecting him in your laws. If you would maintain him in his freedom, you must begin by maintaining him in the equal rights of citizenship.

And now the national safety is staked on this act of justice. You cannot sacrifice the freedman without endangering the peace of the country, and the stability of our institutions. Everything will be kept in jeopardy. The national credit will suffer. Business of all kinds will feel the insecurity. The whole land will gape with volcanic fire, ready to burst forth in a fatal flood. The irrepressible conflict will be prolonged. The house will continue divided against itself. From all these things, Good Lord, deliver us! But, under God, there is but one deliverance, and this is thorough justice.

I have said that the national credit will suffer; but this does not disclose the whole financial calamity. It is idle to suppose that recent rebels, restored to the privileges of citizenship, will give their votes cordially for that national debt which has been incurred in the suppression of their rebellion, or that they will willingly tax themselves for the interest on those enormous outlays by which their darling Slavery has been overthrown. The evidence shows that they are already set against any such contribution. As time advances, and their power is assured, in conjunction with northern sympathizers, they will openly oppose it; or if they consent to recognize it, they will impose the condition that the rebel debt shall be recognized also. All this is inevitable, if you give them the power; it is madness to tempt them.

But they will not have the power if the promises to the freedmen are performed. Here again justice to the freedman becomes a necessity.

It is sometimes said that we must not require justice to the freedman in the rebel States, because justice is still denied to the colored citizen in Connecticut and New York. Idle words of inconceivable utterance; as if the two cases bore any imaginable resemblance. There are rivers in the North and rivers in the South, but who says that on this account the two regions are alike? The denial of justice to the colored citizens in Connecticut and New York, is wrong and mean; but it is on so small a scale that it is not perilous to the Republic, nor is it vital to the protection of the colored citizen, and the protection of the national creditor. You are moved to Enfranchisement in Connecticut and New York, simply in order to do justice to a few individuals; but you are moved to it in the rebel States, in order to do justice to multitudes, also to save the Republic, which is imperiled by injustice on such a gigantic scale, and to supply needful protection to the national freedman and the national creditor. From failure on our part there is in one case little more than shame, while in the other case there is positive danger to the Republic, involving the fate of the national freedman and the national creditor, to whom we are bound by the most solemn ties. To a good man injustice, even on a small scale, cannot be tolerable. He will feel the necessity of resisting it; but where the victims are counted by millions, this necessity becomes a transcendent duty, quickened and invigorated by all the instincts of self-preservation. Therefore, I again say, for the national safety, do not fail to keep these promises.

It is sometimes said that the Constitution of the United States expressly reserves to the States, the power of determining who shall vote, because it declares, that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." But this assumption proceeds on the fatal error, that, at any time under the Constitution, which makes no distinction of color, there can be any such oligarchical distinction as a "qualification," founded on color. But even assuming that this might be done in a period of peace, yet, beyond all doubt, at the present moment, from the necessity of the case—from the Rights of War—from the Constitutional clause of guarantee—and from the Constitutional Amendment, Congress, by its quadruple powers, is completely authorized to do all that it thinks best for the national security and the national faith in the rebel States. As well question Farragut in the maintop of his steamer—Sherman in his march across Georgia—or Grant in the field before Richmond, as question the authority of Congress on this occasion. But if the authority exists it must be exercised.

GUARANTEE OF A REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

II. And this brings me to the next form of this necessity and duty, as they appear in the guarantee clause of the Constitution. It is expressly declared that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a Republican form of government." These words, when properly understood, leave no alternative. They speak to us with no uncertain voice.

The magnitude of the question now before us may be seen in the postulate with which I begin. Assuming that there has been a lapse of government in any State, so as to impose upon the United States the duty of executing this guarantee, then do I insist that it is the bounden duty of the United States to see that such State has a "Republican government," and, in the discharge of this bounden duty, they must declare that a State, which in the foundation of its government, sets aside "the consent of the governed"—which imposes taxation without representation—which discards the principle of Equal Rights, and which lodges power exclusively with an Oligarchy, Aristocracy, Caste, or Monopoly, cannot be recognized as a "Republican government," according to the requirement of American Institutions. Even if it may satisfy some definition handed down from antiquity or invented in monarchical Europe, it cannot satisfy the solemn injunction of our Constitution. For this question I now ask a hearing. Nothing in the present debate can equal it in importance. Its correct determination will be an epoch for our country and for mankind.

Believe me, sir, this is no question of theory or abstraction. It is a practical question which you are summoned to decide. Here is the positive text of the Constitution, and you must now affix its meaning. You cannot evade it; you cannot forget it, without an abandonment of duty. Others in vision or aspiration have dwelt on the idea of a Republic, and they have been lifted in soul. You must consider it, not merely in vision or aspiration, but practically as legislators, in order to settle its precise definition, to the end that the constitutional "guarantee" may be performed. Your powers and duties are involved in this definition. The character of the Government founded by our fathers is also involved in it. There is another consideration, which must not be forgotten. In affixing the proper meaning to the text, and determining what is a "Republican government," you act as a court in the last resort from which there is no appeal. You are sole and exclusive judges. You may decide as you please. Rarely in history has such an opportunity been offered to the statesman. You may raise the name of Republic to majestic heights of justice and truth, or you may let it drag low down in the depths of wrong and falsehood. You may make it fulfill the idea of John Milton, when he said that "a commonwealth ought to be but as one huge Christian personage, one mighty growth or stature of an honest man, as big and compact in virtue as in body;" or you may let it shrink into the ignoble form of a pretender, with the name of Republic, but without its soul.

ORIGIN OF THE GUARANTEE.

Before considering this vital question, it will be proper to look at the origin of this "guarantee," and see how it obtained a place in the Constitution. Perhaps there is no clause which was more cordially welcomed; nor does it appear that it was subjected to any serious criticism in the National Convention, or in any State Convention. It is not found in the Articles of Confederation. But we learn from the Federalist (No. 21) "that the want of this provision was felt as a capital defect in the plan of the Confederation." Mr. Madison, in a private record made in advance of the National Convention, and which has only recently seen the light, enumerates among the defects of the Confederation what he calls "want of guaranty to the States of their Constitutions and laws against internal violence," and he then proceeds to anticipate danger from slavery, which could be counteracted only by such a "guarantee." In showing why this was needed he says that, "according to republican theory, right and power being both vested in the majority, are held to be synonymous; according to fact and experience, a minority may, in an appeal to force, be an overmatch for the majority," and he then adds, in words which furnish a key to the "guarantee" afterwards adopted, "where slavery exists the republican theory becomes still more fallacious;" (Madison's Writings, vol. i, p. 322)—thus showing that, at its very origin, it was regarded as a check upon slavery.

Hamilton was not less positive than Madison. In his sketch of a Constitution, submitted to the National Convention at an early stage of its proceedings, this "guarantee" will be found, and in the elaborate brief of his argument on the Constitution, (Hamilton's Works, vol. ii, p. 463,) it is specified as one of its "miscellaneous advantages." The last words of this remarkable paper are "guarantee of Republican Governments." Randolph, of Virginia, in his sketch of a Constitution proposed the "guarantee," and, in a speech setting forth the evils of the old system, he said that "the remedy must be in the republican principle." (Elliot's Debates, vol. v, pp. 127, 128.) Colonel Mason, of Virginia, taking up the same strain, said that, though the people might be unsettled on some points, they were settled as to others, among which he put foremost "an attachment to republican governments." (Ibid, 217.)

The proposition in its earliest form was "that a republican government, and the territory of each State, ought to be guaranteed by the United States to each State." (Ibid, 128.) This was afterward altered so as to read, "that a republican Constitution and its existing laws ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States." Gouverneur Morris made haste to say that the proposition in this form was "very objectionable," and he added that he should be very unwilling that such laws as exist in Rhode Island should be guaranteed. (Ibid, 352.) After discussion, it was amended, on the motion of Mr. Wilson, the learned and philosophical delegate from Pennsylvania, afterward of the Supreme Court of the United States, so as to read, "that a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to each State, and that each State shall be protected against foreign and domestic violence," (Ibid, 333;) and, in this form, it was unanimously adopted. (Journal of Convention, 113-189.) Afterward it underwent modifications in the Committee of Detail and the Committee on Style, (Ibid, 381,) until it received the final form which it now has in the Constitution, as follows:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence."

Thus stands the "guarantee." If any further reason be required for its introduction into the Constitution it will be found in the prophetic language of the Federalist:

"It may possibly be asked, what need there could be of such a precaution and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments without the concurrence of the States themselves. These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the General Government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the Constitution. But who can say what experiment may be produced by the caprice of particular States, by the ambition of enterprising leaders, or by the intrigue and influence of foreign Powers?"—The Federalist, No. xxi; see also Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. ii, sec. 1811.

The very crisis herein anticipated has arrived. "The caprice of particular States," and "the ambition of enterprising leaders" have done their worst. And now the "guarantee" must be performed, not only for the sake of individual States, but for the sake of the Union to which they all belong, and to advance the declared objects of the Constitution, specified in its preamble.

The text of this great undertaking is worthy of study. No stronger or more comprehensive words could be employed, whether we regard the object, the party guarantying, or the party guaranteed. The express object is a "republican form of government." This is plain enough. The party guarantying is not merely the Executive or some specified branch of the National Government, but "the United States," or in other words, the Nation. The Republic, which is the impersonation of all, guaranties a "republican form of government," and every branch of the National Government must sustain the "guarantee," including especially Congress, where is the collected will of the people. The obligation is not less broad when we consider the party guaranteed. Here there can be no evasion. The "guarantee" is not merely for the advantage of individual States, but for the common defense and the general welfare. It is a "guarantee" to each in the interest of all; and, therefore a "guarantee" to all. And such is the solidarity of States in the Union, that the good of all is involved in the good of each. For each and all, then, this "guarantee" must be performed when the casus fœderis arrives. As a guarantor, the Republic, according to a familiar principle, is called to act on the default of the party guaranteed; but when the default has occurred, then the duty is fixed in all its amplitude.

WHAT IS A REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT?

The question then returns, what is "a Republican form of government," according to the requirement of the Constitution of the United States? Mark, if you please, that it is not the meaning of this term, according to Plato and Cicero; nor even according to the examples of history; nor according to the definitions of monarchical writers or lexicographers; but what is "a Republican form of government" according to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States? Of course these important words were not introduced and unanimously adopted without a purpose. They must be interpreted so as to have a real meaning. Any interpretation which renders them insignificant is on this account to be discarded as irrational and valueless, if not dishonest. They cannot be treated as a phrase only; nor as a dead letter; nor as an empty figure-head. Nor can they be treated as a mere profession and nothing more, so that the Constitution shall merely seem to be republican; reversing the old injunction "to be rather than to seem"—Esse quam videri. They must be treated as real. Thus interpreted they become at once a support of Human Rights and a balance-wheel to our whole political system.

REJECTED DEFINITIONS.

In determining their signification, I begin by putting aside what is vague, unsatisfactory, and inapplicable, in order to bring the inquiry directly to American Institutions.

I put aside all illustration derived from the speculations of ancient philosophers, because, on careful examination, it appears that the term "Republic," as used by them, was so absolutely different from any idea among us as to exclude their definition from the debate. This captivating term is of Roman origin. It is the same as Commonwealth and means the public interests. As originally employed, it was not a specific term, describing a particular form of government, but a general term, embracing all Governments, whether kingly, aristocratic, democratic, or mixed. Its equivalent in Greece was "Polity," which was the general term for all Governments. Therefore, the definition of a Republic, according to these ancient masters, is simply the definition of an organized Government, whether kingly, aristocratic, democratic, or mixed. Following this definition the words of the Constitution are only the "guarantee" of an organized Government, without determining its character. This, of course, leaves open the very question now under consideration.

While the nomenclature of ancient philosophers cannot be cited in determining the definition of a Republic, we may, nevertheless, be encouraged by them in demanding that all government, under whatever name it may be called, shall be to establish justice and secure the general welfare. Thus Plato, who commenced these interesting speculations, is pleased to liken government to a just man, delighting in justice always, however he may be treated by others; and the philosopher insists that every man is a government to himself, as every community is a government to itself. According to him, every well-ordered man, like every well-ordered community, is a Republic. Aristotle, in a different vein, and with more precision, says, in most suggestive words, that "every political society is a sort of community or partnership," (Aristotle's Politics, book i, cap. i,) that "the object of all good government is the common good," (book iii, cap. iv,) that "it is the best plan to admit to a participation in the governing power as many as can be admitted with safety; for where large numbers are excluded, there will be discontent and danger," (Ibid, book iii, cap. vi,) and that "when the One, the Few, or the Many govern well and for the common good, theirs must be called a good Government." (Ib.) Cicero gives to the same ideas new fervor and expansion, when he says, "A Republic is for the good of the whole people. But by the people I do not mean every assemblage of men, anyhow gathered together, but an assemblage united by a common accord respecting rights, and a common enjoyment of the public weal." (De Republica, cap. xxv.) And then again, in another place, the Roman philosopher says, "Liberty can have no certain dwelling in any state except where the laws are equal and the power of public opinion is supreme." (Ibid, cap. xxxi.) But all these requirements or aspirations are applicable to any Government, of whatever form; and it is well known that Cicero recorded his preference for a Government tempered by an admixture of the three different kinds; so that we are not advanced in our definition, unless we insist that our Republic should have all those virtues which are accorded to the ideal Commonwealth. And yet there are two principles which all these philosophers teach us: the first is justice, and the second is the duty of seeking the general welfare.

I next put aside the examples of history, as absolutely fallacious and inapplicable. Governments in all ages have been called Republics, which can be no example to us. Indeed, there is hardly a government, from that of the great hunter, Nimrod, down to insulted and partitioned Poland, which has not been called a "Republic." In 1772, only a few years before the adoption of the National Constitution, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, after dividing Poland, undertook to establish certain fundamental laws for this conquered country, one of which was as follows:

"The government of Poland shall be forever free, independent and republican in form. The true principle of said government consisting in the strict execution of its laws and the equilibrium of the three estates, namely, the king, the senate, and the equestrian order."—John Adams's Works, vol. iv, p. 370.

But a government thus composed cannot be recognized in this debate as "republican in form."

At the adoption of the Constitution, the most competent persons, who disagreed on other things, agreed in discarding these examples. Alexander Hamilton and John Adams met here on common ground. The former, in the brief of his argument on the Constitution, thus exhibits the various forms of government to which the term "Republic" has been applied:

"A republic, a word used in various senses. Has been applied to aristocracies and monarchies. (1.) To Rome under kings. (2.) To Sparta, though a Senate for life. (3.) To Carthage, though the same. (4.) To United Netherlands, though Stadtholder, and hereditary nobles. (5.) To Poland, though aristocracy and monarchy. (6.) To Great Britain, though a monarchy."—Hamilton, Works, vol. ii, p. 463.

John Adams, in his Defense of the Constitution of the United States, written immediately anterior to the adoption of the National Constitution, thus concurs with Hamilton:

"But of all the words in all languages, perhaps there has been none so much abused in this way as the words Republic, Commonwealth, and Popular State. In the Rerum publicarum Collectio, of which there are fifty and odd volumes, and many of them very incorrect, France, Spain, and Portugal, the four great empires, the Babylonian, Persian, Greek, and Roman, and even the German, are all denominated 'Republics.'"—John Adams's Works, vol. v, p. 453.

In his old age, the patriarch expressed himself in the same sense and with equal force:

"The customary meaning of the words republic and commonwealth have been infinite. They have been applied to every government under heaven; that of Turkey and that of Spain, as well as that of Athens and of Rome, of Geneva and San Marino."—Ibid, vol. x, p. 378; Letter of 31st March, 1819.

And then again he said:

"In some writing or another of mine, I happened currente calamo, to drop the phrase, The word republic, as it is used, may signify anything, everything, or nothing. For this escape I have been pelted, for twenty or thirty years, with as many stones as ever were thrown at St. Stephen, when St. Paul held the clothes of the stoners. But the aphorism is literal, strict, solemn truth. To speak technically, or scientifically, if you will, there are monarchical, aristocratical, and democratical republics. The government of Great Britain and that of Poland are as strictly republics as that of Rhode Island or Connecticut."—Ibid, x, 379; Letter of 30th April, 1819.

In this latter remark, Mr. Adams simply repeats what he says in his treatise, when he calls England and Poland "monarchical or regal republics." (Ibid, vol. iv, p. 359.)

It is plain that our fathers, when they adopted the "guarantee" of "a republican form of government" intended something certain, or which at least, if not certain on the face, could be made certain. But this excludes the authority of incongruous and inconsistent examples. They did not use words to signify "anything, everything, or nothing;" nor did they use words which were as applicable to England and Poland as to the United States. Therefore, I cannot err when I put aside all these examples, which, however they may illustrate the definition of Republican Government in times past, are utterly out of place as a guide to the interpretation of our Constitution. Something better must be found for this purpose; nor is it wanting.

I put aside also the definitions of European writers and lexicographers anterior to the Constitution; for all of these have the vagueness and uncertainty of political truth at that time in Europe. Among these none is of higher authority than Montesquieu, who brought to political science study, genius, and a liberal spirit. But even this great writer, who profited by all his predecessors, quickens and elevates without furnishing a satisfactory guide. He taught that "virtue" was the inspiring principle of a Republic, and by "virtue," he says that he meant the love of country, which, he says, is the love of Equality. This is beautiful; but, with curious inconsistency, he proceeds to include "democracy" and "aristocracy" under the term "Republic," the former being where the people in mass have the sovereign power and the latter "where the sovereign power is in the hands of a part of the people." When defining "democracy" he expresses the importance of the suffrage as one of the fundamentals of government, saying, among other things, that it was as important to regulate by whom the suffrage should be given, as in a monarchy to know who is the monarch. (Esprit des Lois, liv. ii, chap. 2 and 3.) But among all these glimpses of truth there is no definition of "a Republican form of government" which can help us essentially in interpreting the Constitution. Surely an aristocracy, "where the sovereign power is in the hands of a part of the people," cannot find a just place in our political system. It may be a "Republican form of government," according to Montesquieu, but it cannot be according to American institutions.

One of the ablest of the predecessors of Montesquieu, in modern times, was the Frenchman, John Bodin, who wrote nearly two centuries earlier. He uses the term "Republic" as it is used by the ancient writers, to embrace Monarchy, Aristocracy, and Democracy, which he calls "three kinds of Republics"—trium rerum publicarum genera. If the Republic is in the power of one, penes unum, it is a monarchy; if in the power of a few, penes paucos, it is an aristocracy; if in the power of all, penes universos, it is a democracy. Proceeding further he says, that a Democracy is "where all or the major part of all citizens, major pars omnium civium, collected together, have the supreme power." (Bodin de Republica, lib. ii, cap. 1.) Here the philosopher plainly follows the rule of jurisprudence in the case of corporations; but this definition seems to sanction the exclusion of a part of the citizens, less than a majority, while it is inadequate in other respects. It says nothing of equality of rights or of that great touchstone of the republican idea, the dependence of taxation upon representation.

There are other definitions which may be put aside. Thus, for instance, it has been often said, that a Republic is "a government of laws and not of men," and this saying found favor with some among our fathers. (John Adams's Works, vol. iv, p. 106.) Long before them Aristotle had declared, that such a government "would be the kingdom of God." But this condition, though marking an advanced degree of civilization and of course essential to a Republic, cannot be recognized as decisive. On its face it is vague from its comprehensiveness. It is enough to say that it would embrace England, whose government our fathers renounced in order to build a Republic. And still further, it would throw its shield over a government which had "framed iniquity into law." This will not do.

There is also a plausible definition by Miller, the learned author of the work on the British Constitution, who states, hypothetically, that by Republic may be meant "a government in which there is no king or hereditary chief magistrate." (Miller's View, vol. iii, p. 326.) But this again must be rejected as leaving aristocracies and oligarchies in the category of republics.

Sometimes it has been said, that a Government with an elective Chief Magistrate is a Republic. Here again nothing is said of aristocracy or oligarchy, which obviously may co-exist with an elective Chief Magistrate, as in the case of Venice, where the elected Doge was surrounded by an oligarchy of nobles; and in the case of Holland, where the elected Stadtholder was a prince surrounded by princes. But there are other instances which make this definition unsatisfactory, if not absurd. The Pope of Rome is an elective Chief Magistrate; so also is the Grand Lama; but surely the States of the Church are not republican, nor is Thibet.

Rejecting the definition founded on the elective character of the Chief Magistrate, we must also reject another, founded on "the sovereignty of more than one man." It has been said positively, by one who has written much on this subject, that "the strict definition of a Republic is that in which the sovereignty resides in more than one man." (John Adams's Works, vol. x, p. 378.) But this strict definition will embrace aristocracies and oligarchies.

I conclude these rejected definitions with that of Dr. Johnson in his Dictionary, which appeared before American Independence:

"Republic; (1)—Commonwealth, state in which the power is lodged in more than one. (2)—Common interest; the public."

All these definitions are as little to the purpose as the "vulgar error," chronicled by Sir Thomas Browne, that storks lived only in republics, or the saying of Rousseau, at a later day, that a society of gods would govern themselves democratically, or the remark of John Adams, that "all good government is, and must be republican." It is evident that we must turn elsewhere for the illumination which we need. If others thus far have failed, it is because they have looked across the sea instead of looking at home, and have searched foreign history and example, instead of simply recognizing the history and example of their own country. They have imported inapplicable and uncertain definitions, forgetting that the Fathers, by positive conduct, by solemn declarations, by declared opinions, and by public acts, all in harmony and constituting one overwhelming testimony, have exhibited their idea of a Republican Government in a way which is at once applicable and certain. They are the natural interpreters of their own Constitution. Mr. Fox, the eminent English statesman, exclaimed on one occasion in debate that, if by some interposition of Divine Providence all the wise men who ever lived in the world were assembled together, they could not invent even a tolerable Constitution; meaning, of course, that a Constitution must be derived from habits and convictions, and not from any invention. There is sound sense in the remark; and it is in this spirit that I turn from a discussion which has only this value, that it shows how little there is in the past to interpret the meaning of the Fathers.

TRUE SOURCE OF DEFINITION.

Every Constitution embodies the principles of its framers. It is a transcript of their minds. If its meaning in any place is open to doubt, or if words are used which seem to have no fixed signification, we cannot err if we turn to the framers; and their authority increases in proportion to the evidence which they have left on the question. By a "republican form of government" our fathers plainly intended that Government which embodied the principles for which they had struggled. Now, if it appears, that, through years of controversy they had insisted on certain principles as vital to free government even to the extent of encountering the mother country in war; that afterward, on solemn occasions, they had heralded these principles to the world as "self-evident truths;" that also, in declared opinions, they had sustained these principles; and that, in public acts, they had embodied these principles—then is it beyond dispute, that these principles must have entered into the idea of that government which they took pains to place under the "guarantee" of the United States. But all these things can be shown unanswerably.

In these words of hypothesis, I have already foreshadowed the four different heads under which these principles may be seen: First, as asserted by the Fathers throughout the long revolutionary controversy which culminated in war; Secondly, as announced in solemn declarations; Thirdly, as sustained in declared opinions; and Fourthly, as embodied in public acts.

PRINCIPLES ASSERTED BY OUR FATHERS PRECEDING THE REVOLUTION.

(1.) I begin with the principles asserted by our fathers throughout the protracted controversy that preceded the Revolution. If Senators ask why our fathers struggled so long in controversy with the mother country, and then went forth to battle, they will find that it was to establish the very principles for which I now contend. To secure the natural rights of men, and especially to vindicate the controlling maxim that there can be no taxation without representation, they fought with argument and then with arms. Had these been conceded at that time there would have been no Lexington or Bunker Hill, and the Colonies would have continued yet longer under transatlantic rule. The first object proposed was not independence but the establishment of these principles; and when at last independence was proposed, it was because it became apparent that these principles could be secured in no other way. Therefore, the triumph of independence was the triumph of these principles, which necessarily entered into and became the animating soul of the Republic which was then and there born. The evidence is complete, and if I dwell on it with some minuteness, it is because of its decisive character on the present occasion.

The great controversy opened with the pretension on the part of Parliament to tax the colonies. This pretension was first disclosed to Benjamin Franklin as early as 1754. It was at the time a profound secret; but this patriot philosopher, whose rare intelligence embraced the natural laws of government not less than those of science, in a few masterly sentences exposed the injustice of taxation without representation. For a moment the ministry shrunk back; but at last, when the power of France had been humbled, and the colonies were no longer needed as allies in war, George Grenville, blind to principle and only seeing an increase of revenue, renewed the irrational claim. The colonies were to be taxed by the Parliament in which they had no representation. Two million and a half of people—for such was the colonial population then—were to pay taxes without any voice in determining them. The men of that day listened to the tidings with dismay. They saw in this ministerial outrage the overthrow of their liberties, whether founded on natural rights or on the rights of British subjects. In their conclusions they were confirmed by two names of authority in British history—Algernon Sidney and John Locke, each of whom had solemnly asserted those liberties which were now in danger. One had borne his testimony on the scaffold; the other in exile.

Sidney, in his Discourses on Government, did not hesitate to say "that God has left to nations the liberty of setting up such Governments as best pleased themselves," and then again, "that all just magistratical power is from the people." (Discourses, p. 36, 14.) Such words were calculated to strengthen the sentiment of human freedom; but it was Locke who gave formal expression to the very principles which were now assailed. In a famous passage of his work on Civil Government, written during his exile in Holland, this eminent Englishman bore his testimony thus:

"It is true government cannot be supported without great charge, and it is fit every one who enjoys his share of the protection should pay out of his estate his proportion for the maintenance of it. But still it must be with his own consent: i. e., the consent of the majority, giving it either by themselves or their representatives chosen by them: for, if any one shall claim a power to lay and levy taxes on the people by his own authority and without such consent of the people, he thereby invades the fundamental law of property and subverts the end of government; for what property have I in that which another may by right take, when he pleases, to himself?"—Locke's Civil Government, book ii, ch. 7, ch. 14.

Here is a plain enunciation of two capital truths: first, that all political society stands only on the consent of the governed; and, secondly, that taxation without representation is an invasion of fundamental right. It was these truths that our fathers embraced in the controversy before them, and these same truths, happily characterized by Hallam as "fertile of great revolutions and perhaps pregnant with more," are as fertile and as pregnant now as then.

Unquestionably, Sidney and Locke exercised more influence over the popular mind, preceding the revolution, than any other writers. They were constantly quoted, and their names were held in reverence. But their authority has not ceased. As they spoke to our fathers, they now speak to us. Sicut patribus, sic nobis.

The cause of human liberty, in this great controversy, found a voice in James Otis, a young lawyer of eloquence, learning, and courage, whose early words, like the notes of the morning bugle mingling with the dawn, awakened the whole country. Asked by the merchants of Boston to speak at the bar against writs of assistance, which had been issued to enforce ancient Acts of Parliament, he spoke, not only as a lawyer, but as a patriot. His speech was the most important, that, down to that occasion, had ever been made on this side of the ocean. An eminent contemporary, who was present, says, "No harangue of Demosthenes or Cicero ever had such effect upon the globe as this speech." (John Adams's Works, vol. x, page 233.) It was the harbinger of a new era. For five hours the brilliant orator unfolded the character of these Acts of Parliament; for five hours he held the court-room in attentive and astonished admiration; but his effort ascended into statesmanship, when, after showing that the colonists were without representation in Parliament, he cried out, that, notwithstanding this exclusion, Parliament had undertaken "to impose taxes and enormous taxes, burdensome, oppressive taxes, ruinous, intolerable taxes," and, then, glowing with a generous indignation at this injustice, he launched that thunderbolt of political truth, "Taxation without representation is Tyranny." From the narrow court-room where he spoke, the thunderbolt passed, smiling and blasting the intolerable pretension. It was the idea of John Locke; but the fervid orator, with tongue of flame, had given to it the intensity of his own genius. He had found it in a book of philosophy; but he sent it forth as a winged messenger, blazing in the sky.

John Adams, who, as a young man just admitted to the bar, was present at this scene, dwells on it often with sympathetic power. There, in the old Town House of Boston, sat the five judges of the province, with Hutchinson as Chief Justice, in robes of scarlet, with cambric bands and judicial wigs; and there too in gowns, bands, and tie-wigs were the barristers. Conspicuous on the wall were full-length portraits of two British Monarchs, Charles II and James II; while in the corners were the likenesses of Massachusetts Governors. In this presence the great oration was delivered. The patriot lawyer had refused compensation. "In such a cause," said he, "I despise all fees." He spoke for his country and for mankind. Firmly he planted himself on the rights of man, which he insisted were, by the everlasting law of nature, inherent and inalienable; and these rights he nobly proclaimed, were common to all, without distinction of color. To suppose them surrendered in any other way than by equal rules and general consent was to suppose men idiots or madmen, whose acts are not binding. But he especially flew at two arguments of tyranny: first, that the colonists were "virtually" represented; and secondly, that there was such a difference between direct and indirect taxation, that while the former might be questionable, the latter was not. To these two apologies he replied: first, that no such phrase as "virtual representation" was known in law or constitution—that it is altogether a subtlety and an illusion, wholly unfounded and absurd—and that we must not be cheated by any such phantom or any other fiction of law or politics, or any monkish trick of deceit and hypocrisy; and, then, in the second place, he said with the same crushing force, that, in the absence of representation, all taxation, whether direct or indirect, whether internal or external, whether on land or on trade, was equally obnoxious to the same unhesitating condemnation. The effect of this effort was electric. The judges were stunned into silence, and postponed their judgment. The people were aroused to a frenzy of patriotism. "American Independence," says John Adams, in the record of his impressions, "was then and there born; the seeds of patriots and heroes were then and there sown, to defend the vigorous youth. Every man of a crowded audience appeared to go away as I did, ready to take arms against writs of assistance. Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born." (J. Adams's Works, vol. x, p. 247; see also pp. 293–375; Tudor's Life of Otis, pp. 71–77.) But this great birth is inseparably associated with the principle, then and there declared, that "Taxation without representation is Tyranny."

From this time forward Otis dedicated himself singly to the cause he had so bravely upheld, and the popular heart clove to him. He became the favorite of his fellow-countrymen. His arguments were repeated; his words were gratefully adopted, and the saying, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," became a maxim of patriotism. In May 1761, only a few weeks after this utterance, he was chosen a representative of Boston, in the Legislature, by an almost unanimous vote. The Crown officers were dismayed by this most significant election, and one of them, speaking with prophetic lamentation, said that "It would shake the province to its foundation," on which John Adams remarked, many years later when some of its results were already visible, "That election has shaken two continents and will shake four." (Ibid., p. 248.) Of course this was simply because it affirmed and invigorated a practical truth of government, by which all the people are lifted to political power. At his new post of duty, Otis became the acknowledged leader, constant, fervid, eloquent, and according to his own language "daring to speak plain English." While still declaring an unhesitating loyalty to the Crown, and even pledging "the last penny and the last drop of blood, rather than, by any backwardness, his Majesty's measures should be embarrassed," he made haste to announce in words, where humor blends with truth, "that God made all men naturally equal; that the ideas of earthly superiority are educational and not innate; that no government has a right to make hobby-horses, asses, and slaves of the subject, nature having made sufficient of the two former for all the lawful purposes of man, from the harmless peasant in the field to the most refined politician in the cabinet; but none of the last, which infallibly proves they are unnecessary." But the case would have been imperfectly stated, if the patriot representative had not once more cried out against taxation without representation and warned against the calamities which must follow from this unquestionable tyranny. This early debate is preserved in a pamphlet, printed in 1762, and entitled "A Vindication of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts Bay, by James Otis, Esq.," which we are told, by an eminent authority, contains, in solid substance, all that is to be found in the Declaration of Rights and Wrongs, issued by Congress in 1774, the Declaration of Independence in 1776, and the subsequent writings of those political philosophers who upheld the national cause. (J. Adams's Works, vol. x, pp. 300-312.) Pardon me if I dwell too minutely on this history. I do it only to illustrate the issue of principle actually made in the controversy with the mother country.

The controversy still continued, when in 1764, the orator, who had already by voice and pen maintained the cause of his country, put forth another publication, entitled, "The Rights of the Colonists asserted and proved." Mark, if you please, the vigor of the title. The rights of the colonists are not only "asserted," but "proved." Reprinted in London, this pamphlet was read by Lord Mansfield, Chief Justice of England, and was answered by Soame Jenyns, a partisan writer of the Crown. The copy I now hold in my hand has the imprint of London, and is marked third edition. Perhaps all things considered, it is the most remarkable pamphlet of our country and one of the most remarkable ever written. Recent events, verifying the truths it so early announced, elevate its place in history. Here will be found the same vital principles, enforced with learning and eloquence, which Otis had announced at the bar in the case of writs of assistance, and then again in the debates of the legislature; and here may be seen, not only the truths asserted by our fathers, but the unanswerable arguments by which they were vindicated. Even an abstract would be too long for this occasion; but the character of this Defense of the American People, not unlike Milton's famous Defensio pro Populo Anglicano, will appear in a few passages, where, as in gleams, may be discerned the Idea of a Republic.

I do not pause on the assertion, "that every man of sound mind should have his vote," or the authority which he invokes, when he says, "Lord Coke declares that it is against Magna Carta and against the franchises of the land for freemen to be taxed but by their own consent." Nor do I dwell on that admirable statement of much in little, where he says, "the first and simple principle is Equality and the Power of the Whole." (Page 14.) The Equality of All and the Power of All! The two buttresses of a just government. I come at once to the plain statement of fundamental right. Here are two sentences:

"The Supreme Power cannot take from any man any part of his property without consent in person, or by representation."

"Taxes are not to be laid on the people, but by their consent in person, or by representation."—Page 57.

Such, he says, are "the first principles of law and justice and the great barriers of a free state," and then he adds, "I ask, I want no more." And these principles he claims for all, without distinction of color.

"The colonists are by the law of nature free-born, as indeed are white and black. Does it follow that it is right to enslave a man because he is black? Will short, curled hair, like wool, instead of Christian hair, as it is called by those whose heart is as hard as the mother mill-stone, help the argument? Can any logical inference in favor of slavery be drawn from a flat nose, a long or a short face?"—Page 28.

Assuming that these rights are common to all, whether white or black, he then insists that any taxation, whether direct or indirect, without representation, is only another form of slavery:

"I can see no reason to doubt but that the imposition of taxes, whether on trade, or on land, or houses, or ships, or real or personal, fixed or floating property in the colonies, is absolutely irreconcilable with the rights of the colonists, as British subjects and as men. I say men, for in a state of nature no man can take my property from me without my consent. If he does he deprives me of my liberty and makes me a slave. The very act of taxing, exercised over those who are not represented, appears to me to deprive them of one of their most essential rights as freemen; and if continued seems to be in effect an entire disfranchisement of every civil right. For what one civil right is worth a rush after a man's property is subject to be taken from him at pleasure, without his consent?"—Page 37.

Such was the voice of James Otis, who was our John the Baptist. It was he who went before in this great controversy. He first stated the case between the colonies and the mother country, and first developed the principles in issue. But though first, he was not long alone. Conspicuous among his followers was Samuel Adams, that austere patriot, always faithful and true, who desired to make Puritan Boston "a Christian Sparta." He was remarkable for the simplicity, accuracy, and harmony of his style, and on this account often held the pen for the Legislature or for the Town meeting. In obedience to the latter, he drew up instructions to the representatives of Boston, which were afterward adopted in Faneuil Hall, where repeating the very arguments of Otis, he says, "If our trade may be taxed, why not our lands? Why not the produce of our lands and everything we possess or make use of?" And then, advancing in the subject, he asks, "If taxes are laid upon us in any shape, without our having a legal representation where they are laid, are we not reduced from the character of free subjects to the miserable state of tributary slaves?" (John Adams's Works, x, p. 294.) In asking this question he leaves no room to doubt the answer it deserved.

Meanwhile Franklin, as the general agent of the colonies, had been maintaining the same principles in England. But the ministry, hurried on by that fatal folly which leads to destruction, persevered in their pretension. The stamp act was passed, and for the first time in our history papers were to bear stamps, in order to swell the revenue of the Crown. Massachusetts remonstrated against the tyranny, in formal resolutions, adopted unanimously, wherein it is declared, "that by the law of nature no man has a right to impose laws more than to levy taxes upon another; that the freeman pays no tax, as the freeman submits to no law, but such as emanates from the body in which he is represented; that the Parliament possessed no right of enacting laws binding upon the colonies, and that whatever legislative power to that effect had been exercised by the Parliament had been abusive and unlawful." (John Adams's Works, vol. i, p. 78.) In an address to the royal Governor, the Legislature, after setting forth the injustice of the stamp act, proceeded to say: "We must beg your Excellency to excuse us from doing anything to assist in the execution of it." The people in town meetings took up the strain and all united against the act. But Massachusetts was not alone. A writer in Virginia, catching the spirit of Otis, declared, in an elaborate pamphlet, that it was an "essential principle of the English Constitution that the subject shall not be taxed without his consent;" and then, again, quoting the words of another, said: "Men have natural and freemen legal rights which they may justly maintain, and no legislative authority can deprive them of." (Considerations on the propriety of Taxes in the British Colonies, p. 5.) The Legislature of Virginia, even before Massachusetts, adopted resolutions kindred in spirit, which were moved by Patrick Henry and heroically carried by his eloquent voice, even against the menacing cry of "treason." Thus spoke Virginia in one of these resolutions, exposing the true issue in question, and insisting that taxation and representation were inseparable:

"Resolved, That the taxation of the people by themselves or by persons chosen to represent them, who can only know what taxes the people are able to bear, or the easiest method of raising them, and must themselves be affected by every tax laid on the people, is the only security against burdensome taxation and the distinguishing characteristic of British freedom, without which the ancient constitution cannot exist."—Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, p. 57.

Pennsylvania, by her House of Assembly, spoke also to the same effect as follows:

"Resolved, Nem. Con. That this House think it their duty thus firmly to assert with modesty and decency, their inherent rights, that their posterity may learn and know that it was not with their consent and acquiescence, that any taxes should be levied on them by any person but their own representatives."

The controversy still proceeded. At the invitation of Massachusetts a Congress assembled at New York in October 1765, where were delegates from Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and South Carolina, which, after a session of three weeks, adopted a declaration of colonial rights, where, among other things, it is declared:

"That it is inseparably essential to the freedom of a people and the undoubted right of Englishmen, that no tax be imposed on them but with their own consent, given personally or by their representatives."

"That the people of the colonies are not, and from their local circumstances cannot be represented in the House of Commons of Great Britain."

At last the stamp act was repealed, but the pretension of taxation was suspended rather than abandoned. A ministerial partisan continued to urge the scheme in the following barefaced words:

"All countries, unaccustomed to taxes, are at first violently prepossessed against them, though the price, which they give for their liberty, like an ox untamed to the yoke, they show at first a very stubborn neck, but by degrees become docile and yield a willing obedience." * * * "America must be taxed."—Justice and Necessity of taxing the American Colonies Demonstrated. London, 1766.

As time advanced the old audacity was revived; and, under the lead of the eccentric Charles Townsend, taxes were imposed by Parliament on tea, glass, lead, paper and painters' colors. The old opposition in the colonies was revived also, and taxation without representation was again denounced. Committees of correspondence were established and the work of organization began. The whole country was in a fever. Massachusetts, as in times past, did not hesitate to proclaim the true principle. At a Town meeting of Boston in 1772, there was a declaration of rights, "which no man or body of men, consistently with their own rights as men and citizens or members of society, can for themselves give up or take away from others;" and here we meet again familiar words:

Against all Parliamentary taxation, as often as it showed itself, this was the impenetrable buckler that was raised. But the mother country was perverse. Ship-loads of tea arrived. At Boston the tea was thrown into the harbor. The colonies entered into an agreement of non-importation. Then came troops, and the Boston Port Bill, by which this harbor was vindictively closed against commerce. The whole country, including even South Carolina, made common cause with Massachusetts. Gadsden exclaimed, "Massachusetts sounded the trumpet, but to Carolina is it owing that it was attended to." And Virginia exclaimed, "We will never be taxed but by our representatives. This is the great badge of freedom. Whether the people in Boston were warranted by justice when they destroyed the tea, we know not; but this we know, that the Parliament, by their proceedings, have made us and all North America, parties in the present dispute." (Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, p. 99.) Meanwhile more troops arrived. All things portended strife; and yet the colonists did not ask for independence. They only asked for their rights, insisting always that there should be no taxation without representation. "The patriots of this province," said John Adams in 1774, "desire nothing new, they wish only to keep their old privileges. They were for one hundred and fifty years allowed to tax themselves. This plan they wish may continue forever." (John Adams's Works, vol. iv, p. 131.) And thus stood the two parties face to face.

Then came the Continental Congress, which at once put forth resolutions, where, after claiming the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property as natural rights, it was insisted that the colonists could be bound by no law to which they had not consented by their representatives. Here was the original programme of James Otis: first the rights of men, according to natural laws; and secondly, the principle that government, including of course taxation, depended on the consent of the governed. "The foundation of English Liberty and of all free government," said these resolutions, "is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council." (American Archives, 4th series, vol. i, p. 822.) In harmony with these resolutions were addresses of the Continental Congress to the people of Great Britain, to the people of the Province of Quebec, and to the king himself, each of which pleads for Human Rights in the largest sense. The address to the people of England begins by an appeal for "the rights of men and the blessings of Liberty," and then insists "that no power on earth has a right to take our property from us without our consent." (Ibid., p. 918.) The address to the people of the Province of Quebec, in similar spirit, says, "the first great right is that of the people having a share in their own government by their representatives, chosen by themselves, and in consequence of being ruled by law, which they themselves approve; not by edicts of men over whom they have no control. This is a bulwark surrounding and defending their property." (Ibid., p. 981.) And the address to the king has the same key-note when it says, "Duty to your Majesty and regard for the preservation of ourselves and our posterity, the primary obligations of nature and of society command us to entreat your royal attention." (Ibid.) Thus constantly, down to the last moment, did our fathers set forth the principles which they sought to establish as essential to free government. Thus constantly did they testify to the cause for which I now plead.

Answering voices came back from England, all showing the principles in issue. The right of taxation was asserted; but there were many who disguised the tyranny by assuming that the colonies were "virtually represented." Sir James Marriott, the Admiralty Judge, insisted boldly, that, since the lands of the colonies, according to their charters, were held in socage tenure, "as of the royal manor of East Greenwich in Kent," and since East Greenwich was represented in Parliament, therefore our fathers were represented in Parliament. Perhaps that spirit of legal technicality, which is satisfied by mere form at the expense of reason, was never more strikingly illustrated than in this senseless argument. The whole pretension was scouted by Mr. Pitt, afterward Lord Chatham, in terms of indignant eloquence. "The idea," said he, "of a virtual representation of America in this House is the most contemptible that ever entered into the head of a man. It does not deserve a serious refutation." As the controversy continued, and especially as those masterly state papers—the addresses of the Continental Congress—reached England, the ministers of the king were put on the defensive. They retained as their advocate none other than Dr. Johnson, who, for a sum of money, lent the pen which had written Rasselas, the Vanity of Human Wishes, and the English Dictionary, to a rancorous attack on the principles of our fathers. Its concentrated spirit was all expressed in its title, "Taxation no Tyranny." Another pamphlet appeared in reply, with the epigraph, "Resistance no Rebellion," embodying the idea that, where there is taxation without representation, resistance is justifiable; and this was issue joined even at London. This was in 1775. Already the "embattled farmers" had gathered at Lexington and Bunker Hill; already Washington had drawn his sword at Cambridge, as Commander-in-Chief and generalissimo of the new-born armies; already war had begun. At last to the defiant watch-word "Taxation no Tyranny," sent from across the sea, our fathers returned that other defiant watchword "Independence." But in seeking Independence, they did not turn their backs upon the principles asserted throughout the long controversy. Independence was the means to an end, and that end was nothing less than a Republic, with Liberty and Equality as the animating principles, where the government should stand on the consent of the governed, or, which is the same thing, where there should be no taxation without representation; for here was the distinctive feature of American Institutions.

SOLEMN DECLARATIONS OF THE FATHERS.

(2.) The principles, heralded through fifteen years of controversy, were not forgotten when Independence was declared; and here I come to the second head of these illustrations.

It sometimes happens that men fail in support of the cause to which they are pledged, or content themselves with something less than the truth. But it was not so with our fathers. In declaring Independence they continued loyal to their constant vows. The natural rights of all men and the just foundation of government, which James Otis had first announced; which Samuel Adams had maintained with splendid simplicity; which Patrick Henry had vindicated, even against the cry of "treason," and which had been affirmed by legislative bodies and public meetings, were embodied in the opening words of the Declaration. There they stand, like a mighty overture to the new Republic, interpreting, inspiring, and filling it with their transforming power. These are the words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Foremost is the Equality of all men. Of course, in a declaration of rights, no such supreme folly was intended as that all men are created equal in form or capacity, bodily, or mental; but simply that they are created equal in rights. This is the first of the self-evident truths that are announced, leading and governing all the rest. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are among inalienable rights; but they are all held in subordination to that primal truth. Here is the starting-point of the whole, and the end is like the starting-point. In announcing that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, the Declaration repeats again the same proclamation of Equal Rights. Thus is Equality the Alpha and the Omega, in which all other rights are embraced. Men may not have a natural right to certain things, but most clearly they have a natural right to impartial laws, by which they shall be secured in Equal Rights. Equality in rights is the first of rights. It was because these truths had been set at naught by Great Britain, in her relations with our fathers, that Independence was declared. To these truths, therefore, was the new Government solemnly dedicated, as it assumed its separate and equal station among the Powers of the earth. Do you ask for the definition of "Republic?" Here it is by patriot lexicographers, whose authority cannot be questioned by us.

As the war of Independence began with a declaration of principles, so it ended with a like declaration. At its successful close, the Continental Congress, in an address to the people, by the pen of James Madison, thus announced the objects for which it had been waged, and thus supplied another definition of the new government:

"Let it be remembered that it has been the pride and the boast of America, that the rights for which she has contended were the rights of human nature. By the blessing of the Author of these Rights, they have prevailed over all opposition and form the basis of thirteen Independent States. No instance has heretofore occurred, nor can any instance be expected hereafter to occur, in which the unadulterated forms of Republican Government can pretend to so fair an opportunity of justifying themselves by their fruits. In this view the citizens of the United States are responsible for the greatest truth ever confided to a political society."—Journal of Continental Congress, April, 1783, vol. viii, p. 201.

Such was the sublime declaration. It was for the "rights of human nature" that our fathers went forth to battle, and these rights are proclaimed to "form the basis of thirteen independent States." But foremost among these rights is Equality, including of course the equal right of all to a voice in the Government. And this is the Republic which our fathers, with pride and boast, then gave as an example to mankind.

The same spirit appears in the National Constitution, which, by its preamble, asserts practically the same sentiments. Here it is:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Thus, according to this proclamation, the Constitution was ordained, not to create an oligarchy or aristocracy, not to exclude certain persons from the pale of its privileges, not to organize inequality of rights in any form, but "to establish justice," which is Equality; "to insure domestic tranquillity," which is vain without justice; "to provide for the common defense," which is the defense of all; "to promote the general welfare," which is the welfare of all; and "to secure the blessings of Liberty" to all the people and their posterity, which is to give to all the complete enjoyment of rights, foremost among which is Equality. Here, then, is another authoritative definition of the Republic which was formed.

Thus has our country testified to its idea of a Republic, not only throughout its long days of controversy, but in these solemn declarations, which are in themselves monumental acts.

OPINIONS OF THE FATHERS.

(3.) I am now brought to consider how these same principles have been sustained by eminent characters, whose names are historic, all testifying to them as essential to good government, which is only the synonym of republican government. In their weighty words you will find a definition, constantly repeated, which is in harmony with all the promises of the Fathers, whether in controversy or in these solemn instruments which are among the very title-deeds of the Republic.

I begin with Benjamin Franklin, who saw all questions of government with a surer instinct than any other person in our history. As early as 1736, while still a young man, he wrote an article on government, which was published in the Pennsylvania Gazette, where will be found these words:

"Popular Governments have not been framed without the wisest reasons. It seemed highly fitting that the conduct of magistrates, created by and for the good of the whole, should be made liable to the inspection and animadversion of the whole."—Franklin's Works, vol. ii, p. 230.

It is for the good of the whole, and not for an odious oligarchy or an aristocratic class that our patriot speaks, and in these words we find foreshadowed the idea of a republican government; but it was in the discussions on the stamp act, after Otis had fulminated his flaming bolt, that we find a fuller and more precise definition. Here it is, as adopted, if not written, by Franklin in 1769:

"That every man of the commonalty, except infants, insane persons, and criminals, is of common right, and by the laws of God, a freeman and entitled to the free enjoyment of liberty. That liberty or freedom consists in having an actual share in the appointment of those who frame the laws, and who are to be the guardians of every man; life, property, and peace; for the all of one man is as dear to him as the all of another; and the poor man has an equal right, but more need to have representatives in the Legislature than the rich one."

"That they who have no voice nor vote in the electing of representatives do not enjoy liberty; but are absolutely enslaved to those who have votes and to their representatives; for to be enslaved is to have governors whom other men have set over us, and be subject to laws made by the representatives of others, without having had representatives of our own to give consent in our behalf."—Franklin's Works, vol. ii, p. 372.

In these emphatic words will be found a complete vindication of the equal right of representation, as essential to free government, so much so, that where this does not exist, Liberty does not exist.

Jefferson has followed Franklin in the same vein, expressing himself with greater fervor. The author of the Declaration of Independence could not do otherwise. Constantly he testifies to his idea of a Republic. Thus he wrote to Alexander von Humboldt, under date of June 13, 1817, affirming the rights of the majority as "the first principle of republicanism," and assuming the principle of Equal Rights:

"The first principle of republicanism is, that the lex majoris partis is the fundamental law of every society of individuals of equal rights. To consider the will of the society constrained by the majority of a single vote as sacred as if unanimous is the first of all lessons in importance, yet the last which is thoroughly learned. This law once disregarded, no other remains but that of force, which ends necessarily in military despotism."—Jefferson's Works, vol. vii, p. 75.

In another letter to John Taylor, of Caroline, dated May 28, 1816, he thus defines a Republic:

"Indeed, it must be acknowledged, that the term republic is of very vague application in every language. Witness the self-styled republics of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Venice, Poland. Were I to assign to this term a precise and definite idea, I would say, purely and simply, it means a Government by the citizens in mass, acting directly and personally, according to rules established by the majority; and that every other Government is more or less republican, in proportion as it has in its composition more or less of this ingredient of the direct action of the citizens."—Jefferson's Works, vol. vii, p. 695.

Here again, while confessing the unquestionable vagueness of the term according to old examples, he assumes that in a Republic all the citizens must have a voice. And in another place he thus indignantly condemns denial of representation:

"And also that one half of our brethren who fight and pay taxes are excluded, like Helots, from the rights of representation, as if society were instituted for the soil and not for the men inhabiting it, or one half of these could dispose of the rights and the will of the other half without their consent."—Ibid., p. 697.

Thus did he scout the whole wretched pretension of oligarchy and monopoly by which citizens are deprived of equal rights.

Madison was colder in nature than Jefferson, but they were associates in opinion, as in political life. The former in the debates on the Constitution thus condemned the denial of rights on account of color:

"We have seen the mere distinction of color, made in the most enlightened period of time, a ground of the most oppressive dominion ever exercised by man over man."—Elliot's Debates, vol. iv, p. 162.

Speaking directly of the right of suffrage, he uses the following language:

"The right of suffrage is certainly one of the fundamental articles of republican government, and ought not to be left to be regulated by the legislature. A gradual abridgment of this right has been the mode in which aristocracies have been built on the ruins of popular forms."—Elliot's Debates, vol. v, p. 338.

Thus declaring himself against "aristocracies," he naturally recognized the true idea, and here he was perplexed by the question of a property qualification, which he says in one place, "does not satisfy the fundamental principle that men cannot be justly bound by laws in making which they have no part." (Ibid., p. 580.) And then again in another place, "It violates the vital principle of free government, that those who are to be bound by laws, ought to have a voice in making them, and the violation would become more strikingly unjust as the law-makers become the minority." (Ibid., p. 582.) Thus completely recognizing the great American principle that just government can stand only on "the consent of the governed," he is brought to this conclusion:

"Under every view of the subject, it seems indispensable that the mass of citizens should not be without a voice in making the laws which they are to obey and in choosing the magistrates who are to administer them."—Ibid., p. 583.

In one of the most remarkable chapters in the Federalist, Madison gives expansion to this idea in his formal definition of a Republic:

"If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by officers holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited time, or during good behavior. It is essential for such a government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion, or a favored class of it; otherwise a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans, and claim for their government the honorable title of republic."—Federalist, No. 39, by Madison.

Thus, in these few significant words, does this authority teach that a Republic is a government "derived from the great body of the people," and not from "a favored class of it." Better words could not be found for the American definition.

Hamilton follows with, perhaps, equal authority. Though approaching political questions from opposite points of view, we find him on this occasion uniting with Franklin, Jefferson, and Madison. Here is a glimpse of the definition he would supply:

"As long as offices are open for all and no constitutional rank is established, it is pure republicanism."—Hamilton's Works, vol. ii, p. 47.

Not for an oligarchy, but for all is a Republic created. Then again he testifies for Equal Rights and against partial distinctions:

"There can be no truer principle than this, that every individual of the community has an equal right to the protection of government." "We propose a free government. Can it be so, if partial distinctions are made?"—Ibid., p. 418.

And then again he says in positive words:

"A share in the sovereignty of the State, which is exercised by the citizens at large in voting at elections, is one of the most important rights of the subject, and in a Republic ought to stand foremost in the estimation of the law. It is that right by which we exist as a free people."—Hamilton, Works, vol. ii, p. 315.

He then portrays the principles of the Revolution as follows:

"They taught the inhabitants of this country to risk their lives and fortunes in asserting their liberty, or, in other words, their right in a share in the government. That portion of the sovereignty to which each individual is entitled, can never be too highly prized. It is that for which we have fought and bled."—Ibid.

More could not be said in the few words employed. But it is when Hamilton comes to consider the Constitution of the United States and to expound its provisions, that, while recognizing the anomalous condition of Slavery, and exposing what he calls "the compromising expedient of the Constitution," by which "the slave is divested of two fifths of the man," he yet declares "the equal level of free inhabitants," and announces "that if the laws are to restore the rights which have been taken away the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants." Here are the important words:

"It is only under the pretext that the laws have transferred the negroes into subjects of property, that a place is disputed them in the computation of numbers; and it is admitted that if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away, the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants."—The Federalist, No. 54, by Hamilton.

Thus, according to Hamilton, if the slaves are restored to the rights which have been taken away—in other words, if they become free men—they will be on the same equal level, and will be entitled to the same equal share of representation with the other inhabitants. The two ideas of Equality and of a right to representation, which were so early and so constantly avowed by the Fathers, are here again recognized as essential conditions of government; and this is the true definition of a Republic.

With these great representative names to illustrate the American idea of a Republic, I might close this catalogue. Surely this is enough. But there are yet others; whose authority cannot be disregarded.

Here is the testimony of that inflexible spirit, who had thought and acted much, Samuel Adams, in a letter to his kinsman, John Adams:

"That the sovereignty resides in the people is a political doctrine which I have never heard an American politician seriously deny." "We, the people, is the style of the Federal Constitution. They adopted it; and, conformably to it, they delegate the exercise of the powers of government to particular persons, who, at short intervals, resign their powers to the people, and they will resign them, or appoint others, as they see fit."—John Adams's Works, vol. vi, p. 421.

Here also is the testimony of another Republican, who signed the Declaration of Independence, Roger Sherman, in a letter to John Adams:

"What especially denominates it a republic is its dependence on the public, or people at large, without any hereditary powers. But it is not of so much importance by what appellation the government is distinguished, as to have it constituted to secure the rights, and advance the happiness of the community."—Ibid., p. 437.

There also was John Adams himself, who was the least distinct of all the fathers on this question; but we find in the introduction to his Defense of the American Constitution a passage which is full of prophetic meaning. Here it is:

"Thirteen governments, thus founded on the natural authority of the people alone, without a pretense of miracle or mystery, and which are destined to spread over the northern part of that whole quarter of the globe, are a great point gained in favor of the rights of mankind."—J. Adams's Works, vol. iv, p. 233.

Here is a plain assertion that our thirteen States were founded "on the natural authority of the people alone," and that they were destined to spread over all North America.

Here also is a voice from South Carolina, in a speech of Charles Pinckney, on the adoption of the Constitution:

"The doctrine of representation is the fundamental of a Republic." "As to the United Netherlands, it is such a confusion of states and assemblies, that I have always been at a loss what species of government to term it. According to my idea of the word, it is not a Republic; for I conceive it as indispensable in a Republic that all authority should flow from the people." "A Republic is where the people at large, either collectively or by representation, form the Legislature."—Elliot's Debates, vol. iv, pp. 326-328.

Colonel Mason, of Virginia, who always spoke with so much point, said in the National Convention:

"The true idea was that every man having evidence of attachment to and permanent common interest with the society, ought to share in all its rights and duties."—Elliot's Debates, vol. v, p. 397.

Here again was a plain recognition of the revolutionary idea. Here, also, is another voice from Virginia. I quote the words of a Virginia writer on government—John Taylor, of Caroline:

"The end of this guarantee is 'a republican form of government.' The meaning of this expression is not so unsettled here as in other countries, because we agree in one descriptive character as essential to the existence of a republican form of government. This is representation. We do not admit a Government to be even in its origin republican, unless it is instituted by representation; nor do we allow it to be so, unless its legislation is also founded upon representation."—Construction Construed, by John Taylor, of Caroline, p. 312.

I close this array, illustrative of opinion, by the words of Daniel Webster, in harmony with the rest:

"Now, fellow-citizens, I will venture to state in a few words what I take these American principles in substance to be. They consist, as I think, in the first place, in the establishment of popular governments on the basis of representation." "This representation is to be made as equal as circumstances will allow."—Webster's Works, vol. ii, p. 601.

Thus, at every stage, from the opening, when Otis announced the master principle, "Taxation without representation is Tyranny," all along to Daniel Webster, we find "representation" an essential element in the American definition of a republican Government.

PUBLIC ACTS OF THE STATES.

(4.) From authoritative opinions I now pass to public acts, which testify to the true idea of Republican Government. These public acts are of two different classes: first, by the United States, in their collective character; and secondly, by the States individually.

Looking at the States, in their collective character, we shall find that at the adoption of the National Constitution they had refused to recognize any exclusion from the elective franchise on account of color or race. The Fathers knew too well the requirements of a Republican Government to sanction any such exclusion. Recognizing Slavery as a transitory condition, which would soon cease, they threw over it a careful oblivion; but they were none the less jealous of the rights of all freemen. The slave did not pay taxes, and, so far as he was a person and not property, he was a part of the family of his master, by whom he was represented, so that the commanding principle of the Revolution was not disturbed in his case. But, on becoming a freeman, the slave stepped at once within the pale of taxation, and therefore necessarily of representation, since the two were inseparable. And this consideration was the guide to our fathers.

The Congress of the Confederation refused point blank to insert the word "white" in the Articles of Confederation. The question came up 25th June, 1778, on these words: "THE FREE INHABITANTS of each of these States (paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted) shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of FREE CITIZENS in the several States." The delegates from South Carolina moved, in behalf of their State, to limit this guarantee to "free white inhabitants." On the question of inserting the word "white," eleven States voted; two in favor of the insertion; one was divided; and eight were against it. South Carolina, not disheartened, made another attempt, by moving to add, after the words "the several States," the further clause, "according to the law of such States respectively for the government of their own FREE WHITE inhabitants," thus seeking again to limit the operation of this guarantee. This proposition was also voted down by the same decisive majority of eight to three. And thus did our fathers testify to the right of representation without distinction of color. On other occasions, for successive years, they constantly gave the same testimony.

By two different acts of the Confederation, one in April, 1783, and another in April, 1784, the war expenses were apportioned among the several States, according to "the number of white and other free citizens and inhabitants," thus positively embracing colored persons. In the Act for the temporary government of the territory "ceded or to be ceded" to the United States, dated April 23, 1784, and drawn by Jefferson, the voters are declared to be the "free males of full age," without distinction of color. In the famous Ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory, drawn by Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, adopted by the Confederation July 13, 1787, and then reenacted by our Congress, after the adoption of the Constitution, the voters are declared to be "free male inhabitants of full age"—again without distinction of color. Then came successive acts of Congress for the government of Territories, where the rule in the Ordinance for the northwestern Territories was followed, and there was no distinction of color. If this rule was changed, it was only when the partakers in the Revolution and the authors of the Constitution had ceased to exercise their influence over public affairs. The testimony of the Fathers was constant, and it is only of this that I speak on this occasion.

Turning from the States collectively, and looking at them individually, we shall find the same testimony. By the Constitution of New Hampshire, at the time of the adoption of the National Constitution, the suffrage was vested in "every male inhabitant of each town and parish" with certain qualifications, but without any exclusion on account of color. By the Constitution of Massachusetts, the suffrage was vested in "every male person" with certain specific qualifications, but without distinction of color. Rhode Island, at the adoption of the Constitution, was under her original colonial charter, which provided for elections by "the major part of the freemen of the respective towns or places," without distinction of color. Connecticut was likewise under her original colonial charter, which required that the voters should have "maturity in years, quiet and peaceable behavior, a civil conversation and forty shillings freehold or forty pounds personal estate," without distinction of color. By the Constitution of New York, the suffrage was vested in "every male inhabitant of full age," with certain specified qualifications, but without distinction of color. By the Constitution of Pennsylvania it was vested in "every freeman of the full age of twenty-one years," with certain specified qualifications, but without distinction of color. By the Declaration of Rights prefixed to the Constitution of Delaware, it was announced that "every freeman, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest, with an attachment to the community, hath the right of suffrage," without distinction of color. By the Constitution of Maryland the suffrage was vested in "all freemen above twenty-one years of age," with certain specified qualifications, but without distinction of color. By the Declaration of Rights prefixed to the Constitution of Virginia it was announced that "ALL MEN having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest, with an attachment to the community, have the right of the suffrage," without distinction of color. And it is added that "they cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public use, without their own consent or that of their representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not in like manner assented for the public good." By the Constitution of North Carolina the suffrage was vested in "all freemen of the age of twenty-one years," with certain specified qualifications, and without distinction of color; and this rule continued down to 1835, when the Constitution was amended or rather, let me say perverted. That eminent citizen, Chief Justice Gaston, of North Carolina, in giving judgment at a later day, said: "It is a matter of universal notoriety that free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise." (4 Dev. and Battle, Rep. 35. The State vs. Manual.) By the Constitution of Georgia the suffrage was vested in "citizens and inhabitants," with certain specified qualifications, but without distinction of color. To these States I may add Tennessee, which was carved out of North Carolina, and followed her benign example. Her Constitution, which was adopted in 1796, vested the suffrage in "every freeman of twenty-one years," with certain qualifications, but without distinction of color; and this rule continued down to the perversion of the Constitution in 1834. Mr. Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, once Postmaster General, is reported to have said that he was originally elected to Congress by the votes of colored persons, and I have heard Mr. John Bell make the same confession with regard to himself.

It only remains to speak of South Carolina, the early and constant marplot of republican institutions, where, by the Constitution, the suffrage was vested "in every free white man, and no other person," with certain specified qualifications. This was the only State, among the original Thirteen, which at that time allowed a discrimination, founded on color, to find a place in its Constitution. It was the only State which, after uniting in a National Declaration, that "all men are created equal," openly and audaciously commenced the example of a "white man's Government." This apostate idea, which has since played such a part as a disturber of the national peace, was then and there born, as the opposite idea was born in Massachusetts, under the inspiring words of James Otis. And every other State followed this early voice. Their constitutions spoke of "persons," "inhabitants," "freemen," or better still "men," without any prefix of "white." Color was not mentioned. But even in South Carolina, which introduced the discreditable tyranny into her Constitution, this exclusion was more apparent than real. In point of fact, even as late as 1790, when the first census was taken, there were in this State only one thousand eight hundred and one free colored citizens. Of course their exclusion was wrong, mean, and un-republican; but I do not assert that it was on such a scale as to justify the interference of the Nation to reform it, especially where there was no lapse of the State Government. On the other hand its sufferance cannot be interpreted into a waiver of the principles for which the Revolution was fought.

Such are the public acts of the States collectively and individually at the time of the adoption of the National Constitution, illustrating with rare harmony the American idea of a Republic, and testifying against any exclusion founded on color. Add to these that the National Constitution, which carefully excepts "Indians not taxed" from the basis of representation, pays an open homage to the principle that there can be no taxation without representation. Add then, that it expressly founds the Government upon "the people," not only in the preamble, which begins "we, the people," but also in providing that the House of Representatives shall be "chosen by the people of the several States." Add also the crowning fact, that it recognizes no distinction of color—that it treats all with the same impartial justice—and who are you, sir, who will dare to foist into this Magna Carta an oligarchical idea which can find no sanction in its republican text?

AMERICAN DEFINITION OF A REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENT.

And here I bring this part of the argument to a close. We have seen the origin of the controversy which led to the Revolution, when Otis, with such wise hardihood, insisted upon Equal Rights, and then giving practical effect to the lofty demand, sounded the battle-cry that "Taxation without Representation is Tyranny." We have followed this controversy in its anxious stages, where these principles were constantly asserted and constantly denied, until it broke forth in battle; we have seen these principles adopted as the very frontlet of the Republic, when it assumed its place in the family of nations, and then again when it ordained its Constitution; we have seen them avowed and illustrated in memorable words by the greatest authorities of the time; lastly, we have seen them embodied in public acts of the States collectively and individually; and now, out of this concurring, cumulative, and unimpeachable testimony, constituting a speaking aggregation absolutely without precedent, I offer you the American definition of a Republican form of government. It is in vain that you cite philosophers or publicists, or the examples of former history. Against these I put the early and constant postulates of the Fathers, the corporate declarations of the Fathers, the avowed opinions of the Fathers, and the public acts of the Fathers, all with one voice proclaiming: first, that all men are Equal in rights; and secondly, that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; and here is the American idea of a Republic, which must be adopted in the interpretation of the National Constitution. You cannot reject it. As well reject the decalogue in determining moral duties, or as well reject the multiplication table in determining a question of arithmetic.

Counter to this irresistible conclusion there can be only one suggestion having any seeming plausibility, and this is founded on the contemporary recognition of slavery. On this point it is enough if I remind you, first, that our fathers did not recognize slavery as a permanent part of our system, but treated it as exceptional and transitory, while they concealed it from view by words which might mean something else; secondly, that the slave was always regarded, legally and politically, as a part of the family of his master, according to the nomenclature of Blackstone's Commentaries, which were much read at the time, where master and servant were grouped with husband and wife, parent and child, and, as in the case of wife and child, the slave was represented by the head of the family, who also paid the taxes on his account, so that, in his case, the cardinal principle of the Revolution, associating representation and taxation together, was not in any respect violated; and thirdly, that by the acts of the Continental Congress, and by all the State Constitutions, except that of South Carolina, all distinction of color was discarded in determining the elective franchise, and that one of the authorized expounders of the National Constitution at the time Alexander Hamilton announced in the Federalist, as if anticipating the very question now before us, IF THE LAWS WERE TO RESTORE THE RIGHTS WHICH HAVE BEEN TAKEN AWAY, THE NEGROES COULD NO LONGER BE REFUSED AN EQUAL SHARE OF REPRESENTATION WITH OTHER INHABITANTS. Such was the understanding, and such was the promise at the adoption of the Constitution. Such was the declared meaning of our fathers, according to the contemporary testimony of Alexander Hamilton. Therefore, while confessing sorrowfully their inconsistency in recognizing slavery, and throwing over their shame the mantle which the son of Noah threw over his father, we must reject every argument or inference on this account against the true idea of a Republic, which is none other than where all the citizens have an equal voice in the Government. As Washington, by his august example, gave to mankind a new idea of political greatness, so did the Fathers, by their great example, give to mankind a new idea of government. Do you ask again for authority? I offer it to you. It is an early Dictionary of James Otis, Samuel Adams, Patrick Henry, and Benjamin Franklin. It is in the Lexicon of the Revolution. It is in the Thesaurus of our national history. It is in the Collection of Public Acts. This new idea was the great discovery of our fathers. Rob them of this, and you take from them their highest title to gratitude. Columbus, venturing into an unknown sea, discovered a New World of space; but our fathers, venturing likewise, discovered a New World of public duty. It is for us, their children, not to forget their discovery.

RECENT FRENCH DEFINITIONS.

After our own country, there is one other only which can help in determining what is a Republican form of government, and this is France. There, as in the United States, a Republic has been declared. If in the former country it failed to be maintained; still the generous effort has been made, and we have its testimony. This is explicit. As the Provisional Government in 1848 proclaimed the Republic, it was careful, after proper deliberation to proclaim at the same time "universal suffrage," which Lamartine, standing on the steps of the Hotel de Ville, and speaking in the name of the government, said was "the first truth and only basis of every National Republic." (Garnier Pagés, Histoire de la Revolution, tom. i, p. 328.) The proclamation of the Republic was itself submitted to the vote of "all the citizens;" and on the terms of this submission another member of the Government, of solid sense and perfect fidelity, thus expresses himself:

"By these words—all the citizens—the Provisional Government intended to consecrate definitively the fundamental principle of democracy; it intended to proclaim openly and forever the inalienable, imprescriptible right, inherent in each member of society, to participate directly in the government of his country; it intended to put in practice effectually and loyally the great principles until then shut up in the domain of the abstract theories of philosophy."—Ibid, tom. v, p. 348.

The same person, M. Garnier Pagés, who was at once an eminent actor in these scenes and their most authentic historian, thus again dwells on the true idea of a Republic:

"The Republic, that government of all by all where each has his place, his duty, and his right; the Republic, that is Liberty itself, the liberty to do every act and to put forth every thought not injurious to another; the Republic, that fraternal ground where are admitted all parties, the representatives of the past as well as those of the future, where every intelligence, and every association can develop its authority."—Ibid, tom. vii, p. 407.

To this authentic testimony of modern France, in harmony with our own country, I add the definition of a very recent foreign publicist, who, after dwelling on Equality as the idol sentiment of a Republic, says:

"This shows us the nature and the end of republican government. It is a Government founded on the general interests and equality."—Block, Dictionnaire de la Politique, article, République.

Admirable words! in themselves a definition. And here, before closing this testimony, let me call attention to two authorities, contemporary with our fathers, which stand apart, one English and the other German. The first is that of Dr. Richard Price, the friend of John Adams, who very early appreciated the American Revolution, and vindicated it before the world. Here is his idea of good government, compendiously expressed:

"Legitimate government consists only in the dominion of Equal Laws made with common consent, and not in the dominion of any man over other men."—J. Adams's Works, vol. iv, p. 401.

The German was none other than that great thinker, Emanuel Kant, who, in his speculations on Perpetual Peace, says, that to this end every State should be a Republic, which he defines as follows:

"That form of government where every citizen participates by his representative in the exercise of the legislative power, and especially in that of deciding on the questions of peace and war."—Wheaton, History of Law of Nations, p. 751.

The statement of Kant is as simple as Pure Reason, which is the title of his great work. It claims plainly for "every citizen" a share in the Government; and such is the definition furnished by this eminent philosopher, whose name, rarely quoted in politics, is an unimpeachable authority.

REBEL STATES ARE NOT REPUBLICAN GOVERNMENTS.

Such is the definition of a Republican form of government. It remains now that we should bring these lapsed States to this standard, and see their small title to recognition. Authentic figures are not wanting. The census of 1860 discloses the population of the States in question. Here is the table:

States.	White population.	Colored population, slave and free, including Indians.
Alabama.....	526,271	436,930
Arkansas.....	324,243	111,307
Florida.....	77,747	62,677
Georgia.....	591,550	465,736
Louisiana.....	357,456	350,546
Mississippi.....	353,901	437,404
North Carolina.....	629,942	362,680
South Carolina.....	291,300	412,408
Tennessee.....	826,722	283,079
Texas.....	420,891	103,324
Virginia.....	1,047,299	549,019
	5,447,222	3,666,110

A glance at this table is enough. Taking the sum total of the population in the eleven States, we find 5,447,222 whites to 3,666,110 colored persons; and you are now to decide, whether in the discharge of your duties under the Constitution, and bound to guaranty a Republican form of government, you will disfranchise this mighty mass, shutting them out from those Equal Rights promised by our fathers, and from all voice in the government of their country. They surpass in numbers, by at least a million, the whole population of the colonies at the time our fathers raised the cry, "Taxation without Representation is Tyranny;" and now you are to decide whether you will strip them of representation while you subject them to a grinding taxation by tariff and excise, acting directly and indirectly, which dwarfs into insignificance everything attempted by the British Parliament. Our fathers could not bear a stamp act, in the making of which they had no voice, and they went forth to battle with the most formidable Power of the globe, rather than pay a tax of threepence on tea imposed by a Parliament in which they were not represented. Are you ready, sir, in disregard of this great precedent, and in disregard also of all the promises and examples of our past history, to thrust a single citizen out of all representation in the Government, while you consume his substance with taxation, subject him to stamp acts, compel him to pay a duty of twenty-five cents a pound on tea, and then follow him with your imposts in all the business of life? Clearly if you do not recognize his title to representation, you must at least by careful legislation relieve him from this intolerable taxation. Some of these millions, whom you thrust out, already contribute largely to the public revenue. How, then, can you deny them representation? Their money is not rejected. Why reject their votes? But if you reject their votes, you cannot take their money. As you can detect no color in their money, you ought to detect no color in their votes.

If looking at these States together the duty of Congress seems clear, it becomes clearer even when we look at them separately. Begin with Tennessee, which disfranchises 283,079 citizens, being more than a quarter of its whole "people." Thus violating a distinctive principle of republican government, how can this State be recognized as republican? This question is easier asked than answered. But Tennessee is the least offensive on the list. There is Virginia, which disfranchises 549,019 citizens, being more than a third of its whole "people." There is Alabama, which disfranchises 436,030 citizens, being nearly one half of its whole "people." There is Louisiana, which disfranchises 350,546 citizens, being one half of its whole "people." There is Mississippi, which disfranchises 437,404 citizens, being much more than one half of its whole "people." And there is South Carolina, which disfranchises 412,408 citizens, being nearly two thirds of its whole "people." A Republic is a pyramid standing on the broad mass of the people as a base; but here is a pyramid balanced on its point. To call such a government "republican" is a mockery of sense and decency. A monarch, "surrounded by republican institutions," which at one time was the boast of France, would be less offensive to correct principles, and give more security to Human Rights.

It is not difficult to classify these States. They are aristocracies or oligarchies. An aristocracy, according to the etymology of the word, is the government of the best. An oligarchy is the government of the few, and is not even an aristocracy, but an abuse of aristocracy, as despotism is the abuse of monarchy. Perhaps these States may be characterized in either way; and yet the term aristocracy, especially in its origin, has something respectable which cannot be attributed to a combination, whose single distinctive element is the color of the skin.

The eminent publicist, Bodin, in his definition of an aristocracy, says that it exists where a smaller body of citizens governs the greater, and this definition has been adopted by others, especially by Montesquieu. But this is not satisfactory. Hallam, whose judgment is of the highest value, after discussing the merits of this definition, proposes the following most suggestive substitute:

"We might better say, that the distinguishing characteristic of an aristocracy is the enjoyment of privileges which are not communicable to other citizens simply by anything they can themselves do to obtain them."—Hallam's Literature of Europe, vol. ii, cap. 4, sec. 52.

These words completely characterize the aristocracy of color; for such an aristocracy is plainly in the enjoyment of privileges, which are not communicable to other citizens, by anything they can themselves do to obtain them.

To show that our rebel States are aristocracies or oligarchies is enough for the present occasion. But we must not forget that, born of Slavery, they have the spirit of that iniquity, so that they are essentially of a low type. Founded on the color of the skin, they are, beyond all question, the most senseless and disgusting of all history. Would you know to what they might incline? Listen to the frank words of the greatest Venetian writer, the famous Father Paul, while he counsels the privileged class, in a state refined by art and elevated by glory, how to use their powers. "If a noble," says he, "injure a plebeian, justify him by all possible means; but should that be found quite impossible, punish more in appearance than in reality. If a plebeian insult a noble, punish him with the greatest severity, that the commonalty may know how perilous it is to insult a noble." (Sarpi, Opinione per il perpetuo Dominio di Venezia, p. 13.) Such is the terrible rule laid down in a document, which taught how to make the power of Venice perpetual. But this same spirit predominates still in the rebel States. It rages there with more revolting cruelty than it ever raged in Venice. And such is the government which now claims recognition as "republican."

The pretension thus organized is hateful on another ground. It is nothing less than a Caste, which is at once irreligious and un-republican. A Caste cannot exist except in defiance of the first principles of Christianity and the first principles of a Republic. It is Heathenism in religion and tyranny in government. The Brahmins and the Sudras in India, from generation to generation, have been separated, as the two races are now separated in these States. If a Sudra presumed to sit on a Brahmin's carpet he was punished with banishment. But our recent rebels undertake to play the part of Brahmins, and exclude citizens, with better title than themselves, from essential rights, simply on the ground of Caste, which, according to its Portuguese origin, casta, is only another term for race.

But this pretension is in yet other respects hostile to good government. It is essentially a Monopoly in a country which sets its face against all monopolies as unequal and immoral. If any monopoly deserves unhesitating judgment it must be that which absorbs the rights of others and engrosses political power. How vain it is to condemn the petty monopolies of commerce and then allow this vast, all-embracing monopoly of Human Rights.

Clearly, most clearly, and beyond all question, such a government cannot be considered "republican in form." Call it an Oligarchy, call it an Aristocracy, call it a Caste, call it a Monopoly; but do not call it a Republic.

DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Of course such a government can exist only in defiance of the Constitution, and it is the duty of Congress to interfere against it. President Johnson, in his annual message, says:

"In case of the usurpation of the government of a State by one man or an Oligarchy, it becomes the duty of the United States to make good the guarantee to that State of a Republican form of government."

The President forgets to mention an Aristocracy, and does not add, what is true, that the authority which must make good the guarantee is the sole judge of the exigency. To this end everything centers in Congress whose powers are commensurate with the occasion. In aid of the "guarantee" clause are those other words in the Constitution, providing that Congress "shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in the Government of the United States." Under this ample provision there is a duty to be performed, by any means which may seem best. The jurisdiction is complete and it is in Congress. If any authority for this proposition were needed it would be found in the words of Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States:

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on the application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

"Under this article of the Constitution, it rests with Congress to decide what government is established one in a State. For, as the United States guaranty to each State a Republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is Republican or not."—7 Howard Rep. 42, Luther vs. Borden.

In the exercise of this power two courses at least are open. One is to impose an irreparable condition upon the unrepudiated States, requiring them, before recognition, to reform their governments to the satisfaction of Congress. The other, and more direct course, is by Act of Congress, in performance of the "guarantee," and according to the plenary authority "for carrying into execution the powers vested in the Government of the United States," to provide all needful safeguards and especially to place the Equal Rights of All under the guardianship of National Law.

Against the exercise of this power there are but two arguments. First, that the Constitution, by providing that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," has reserved to each State the power of excluding citizens merely on account of color, even though constituting more than a majority of the population. The other argument is that, since certain States at the North have disfranchised the few colored persons within their borders, the United States are so far constrained by this example that they cannot protect the millions of freedmen in the rebel States from disfranchisement, and cannot save the Republic from the peril of such a crying injustice. I know not which of these two arguments is the least reasonable, or rather, which is the most reprehensible. They are both unreasonable and both reprehensible. They both do violence to the true principles of the Constitution, if not to common sense.

It is true that, according to the text of the Constitution, each State may determine the "qualifications" of electors, but this can have no application to an exigency like the present, where, at the close of a prolonged and desperate rebellion, the United States are obliged to guaranty to certain States a republican form of government. In the performance of this "guarantee," the United States can look only at the essential elements of such a government; nor more nor less; without regard to State laws. But I am not willing to rest the argument here. Even assuming that there has been no lapse of State governments, so as to bring the "guarantee" into operation—assuming that we are in a condition of assured peace—then I utterly deny that the power to determine the "qualifications" of electors can give any power to disfranchise actual citizens. It is "qualifications" only which the States can determine, meaning, by this limited term, those requirements of personal condition which are regarded as essential to the security of the franchise. These "qualifications" cannot be in their nature permanent or insurmountable. Color cannot be a "qualification," any more than size or the quality of the hair. A permanent or insurmountable "qualification" is equivalent to a deprivation of the suffrage—in other words, it is the tyranny of taxation without representation, and this tyranny, I insist, is not intrusted to any State of this Union. This is the very ground taken by Mr. Madison, when, defending the National Constitution in the Virginia convention, he said:

"Some States might regulate the elections on the principle of Equality, and others might regulate them otherwise." * * * "Should the people of any State, by any means, be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government." * * * "If the elections be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. This power appears to be satisfactory and unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."—Elliot's Debates, vol. iii, p. 347.

With these decisive words from one of the chief framers of the Constitution, backed by the reason of the case, I dismiss this objection to the little consideration it deserves. And I dismiss to the same indifference that other objection, that our hands are tied because certain Northern States have done a wrong and mean thing. Pray, sir, how can the failure of these States affect the power of Congress in a great exigency under the Constitution of the United States? But duty on the present occasion is identical with power. No matter if this power has been long dormant, it is none the less vital. It is like that slumbering statute, which Cicero describes as a sword in the scabbard, tanquam gladius in vagina. It only remains that it should be drawn forth.

This duty has been fortified by the Constitutional Amendment, which, after providing for the abolition of slavery, empowers Congress to "enforce" it by "appropriate legislation," thus heaping Ossa upon Pelion. Clearly under these words Congress may do what, in its discretion, seems "appropriate" to this end, and there is no power to call its action in question. On this point, the authority of the Supreme Court, in the masterly judgment of Chief Justice Marshall, is most explicit:

"The government, which has a right to do an act and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means, and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception." * * * "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution are Constitutional."—4 Wheaton R. 409-421—McCullough vs. Bank of Maryland.

These words of the Chief Justice are reinforced by a kindred declaration from another great authority, Mr. Justice Story, speaking also for the Supreme Court, on an important occasion:

"The Constitution unavoidably dealt in general language. It was not intended merely to provide for the exigencies of a few years, but was to endure through a long lapse of ages; the events of which were locked up in the inscrutable purposes of Providence. Hence the Constitution leaves it to the legislative power from time to time, to adopt its own means to effectuate legitimate objects."—1 Wheaton R. 325; Martin vs. Hunter.

Apply these words to the present question, and the conclusion is irresistible. Whatever legislation shall seem to Congress "appropriate" to "enforce" the abolition of slavery; whatever "means" shall seem "proper" to this end, must be within the powers of Congress under the Constitutional Amendment. You cannot deny this principle without setting aside those most remarkable judgments which stand as landmarks of constitutional history. But who can doubt that the abolition of the whole Black Code, in all its oligarchical pretensions, civil and political, is "appropriate" to "enforce" the abolition of Slavery? Mark, if you please, the language of this grant. Congress may "enforce" abolition, and nobody can question the "means" which it thinks best to employ. Let it not hesitate to adopt the "means" which promise to be the most effective. As the occasion is extraordinary, so the "means" employed must be extraordinary.

But the Senate has already by solemn vote asserted this very jurisdiction. You have, sir, decreed that colored persons shall enjoy the same civil rights as white persons; in other words, that, with regard to civil rights, there shall be no Oligarchy, Aristocracy, Caste, or Monopoly, but that all shall be equal before the law without distinction of color. And this great decree you have made as "appropriate legislation" under the Constitutional Amendment "to enforce" the abolition of slavery. Surely you have not erred in this act. Beyond all question the protection of colored persons in civil rights is essential to complete the abolition of slavery; but the protection of colored persons in political rights is not less essential; and the power is as ample in one case as in the other. In each case you legislate for the maintenance of colored persons in that Liberty which has been so tardily accorded, and the legislation is just as "appropriate" in one case as in the other. The protection of colored persons in their civil rights by Act of Congress will be a great event. It will be great in itself. It will be greater still, because it establishes the power of Congress, without any further amendment of the Constitution, to protect colored persons in all their rights, including of course the elective franchise. There are precedents of Congress, as well as of courts, which are landmarks; and this is one of them.

Therefore, as authority for Congress you have two sources in the Constitution itself, first, the guarantee clause, and, secondly, the Constitutional Amendment; each sufficient—the two together a twofold sufficiency. To establish the Equal Rights of All, no further amendment is needed. The actual text is exuberant. Instead of adding new words, it will be enough if you give to those which exist the natural force which belongs to them. Instead of neglecting them, use them. Instead of supplementing them, interpret them. An illustrious magistrate once retorted upon an advocate, who, dissatisfied with a ruling of the court, threatened to burn his books, "You had better read them;" and so would I say now to all who think the Constitution needs amendment, you had better read it. Yes, sir, read it in the principles proclaimed by the Fathers before the Revolution; read it in the declarations of the Fathers when they took their place as a Republic; read it in the avowed opinions of the Fathers; read it in the Public Acts of the Fathers; and in all this beaming light you will discern its true meaning. Then again read it in that other light which, as from another sun, newly risen at mid-day, streams from the obligation of Congress to "enforce" the abolition of slavery. And then again read it in the glowing illumination of the war. But, in whichever light you read it, you will find always the same irresistible meaning. Even if the text were doubtful, the war makes it clear. The victory which overthrew slavery has carried with it all those glosses and constructions by which this wrong was originally fastened upon the Constitution. For generations the Constitution has been interpreted for Slavery. From this time forward it must be interpreted, in harmony with the Declaration of Independence, so that Human Rights shall always prevail. The promises of the Fathers must be sacredly fulfilled. This is the commanding rule, superseding all other rules. This is one of the great victories of the war—perhaps the greatest. It is nothing less than the Emancipation of the Constitution itself.

THE BALLOT, THE ONLY SUFFICIENT GUARANTEE.

Mr. President, such is the testimony of history, authority, and Constitution, which binds the judgment on this occasion, leaving no alternative. Thus far, I have done little but bring the diversified testimony together and weave it into one body. It is not I who speak. I am nothing. It is the cause, whose voice I am, which speaks to you. But there are yet other things which, even at this late hour, crave to be said. And here, after this long review, I am brought back to more general considerations, and end as I began, by showing the necessity of Enfranchisement for the sake of Public Security and Public Faith. I plead now for the ballot, as the Great Guarantee; and the only Sufficient Guarantee—being in itself peacemaker, reconciler, schoolmaster, and protector—to which we are bound by every necessity and every reason; and I speak also for the good of the States lately in rebellion, as well as for the glory and safety of the Republic, that it may be an example to mankind.

Let me be understood. What I especially ask is impartial suffrage, which is, of course, embraced in universal suffrage. What is universal is necessarily impartial. For the present, I simply insist that all shall be equal before the law, so that, in the enjoyment of this right, there shall be no restriction which is not equally applicable to all. Any further question, in the nature of "qualification," belongs to another stage of the debate. And yet I have no hesitation in saying that universal suffrage is a universal right, subject only to such regulations as the safety of society may require. These may concern (1) age, (2) character, (3) registration, (4) residence. Nobody doubts that minors may be excluded, and so, also, persons of infamous life. Registration and residence are both prudential requirements for the safeguard of the ballot-box against the Nomads and Bohemians of politics, and to compel the exercise of this franchise where a person is known among his neighbors and friends. Education also, may, under certain circumstances, be a requirement of prudence, especially valuable in a Republic, where so much depends on the intelligence of the people. These temporary restrictions do not in any way interfere with the right of suffrage, for they leave it absolutely accessible to all. Even if impediments, they are such as may be easily overcome. At all events, they are not in any sense insurmountable, and this is the essential requirement of republican institutions. No matter under what depression of poverty, in what depth of obscurity, or with what diversity of complexion you may have been born, you are, nevertheless, a citizen—the peer of every other citizen, and the ballot is your inalienable right.

The ballot is a peacemaker, and, as we not told, Blessed are the peacemakers. High among the Beatitudes let it be placed, for there it belongs. Deny it, and the freedman will be the victim of a perpetual warfare. In ceasing to be a slave he only becomes a sacrifice. Grant it, and he is admitted to those Equal Rights which allow no sacrifice. Plutarch records that the wise man of Athens charmed the people by saying that Equality causes no War, and "both the rich and poor repeated it." And so master and slave will yet enjoy the transforming power of this principle. The master will recognize the new citizen. The slave will stand with tranquil self-respect in the presence of the master. Brute force disappears. Distrust is at an end. The master is no longer a tyrant. The freedmen is no longer a dependent. The ballot comes to him in his depression, and says, "Use me and be elevated." It comes to him in his passion, and says, "Use me and do not fight." It comes to him in his daily thoughts, filling him with the strength and glory of manhood.

The ballot is a reconciler. Next after peace is reconciliation. But reconciliation is more than peace. It is concord. Parties that have been estranged are brought into harmony. They learn to live together. They learn to work together. They are kind to each other, even if it be only as the Arab and his horse; and this mutual kindness is a mutual advantage. Unquestionably, the ballot promotes this great boon, because it brings all into natural relations of justice, without which reconciliation is a vain thing. Do you wish to see harmony truly prevail, so that industry, society, government, civilization, may all prosper, and the Republic may wear a crown of true greatness? Then do not neglect the ballot.

The ballot is a schoolmaster. Reading and writing are of inestimable value, but the ballot teaches what these cannot teach. It teaches manhood. Especially is it important to a race whose manhood has been denied. The work of redemption cannot be complete if the ballot is left in doubt. The freedman already knows his friends by the unerring instinct of the heart. Give him the ballot, and he will be educated into the principles of government. Deny him the ballot, and he will continue an alien in knowledge as in rights. His claim is exceptional, as your injustice is exceptional. For generations you have shut him out from all education, making it a crime to teach him to read for himself the Book of Life. Let not the tyranny of the past be an apology for any further exclusion. Prisoners for a long time immured in dungeons are sometimes blinded as they come forth into the light of day; but this is no reason for continued imprisonment. To every freedman the ballot is the light of day.

The ballot is a protector. Perhaps, at the present moment, this is its highest function. Slavery has ceased in name; but this is all. The old masters still assert an inhuman power, and now by positive statutes seek to bind the freedman in new chains. Let this conspiracy proceed unchecked, and the freedman will be more unhappy than the early Puritan, who, seeking liberty of conscience, escaped from the "lords bishops" only to fall under the "lords elders." The master will still be master under another name, as according to Milton,

Serfdom or apprenticeship is slavery in another guise. To save the freedman from this tyranny, with all its accumulated outrage, is your solemn duty. For this we are now devising guarantees; but, believe me, the only sufficient guarantee is the ballot. Let the freedman vote, and he will have in himself under the law a constant, ever-present, self-protecting power. The armor of citizenship will be his best security. The ballot will be to him sword and buckler—a sword with which to pierce his enemies, and a buckler on which to receive their assault. Its possession alone will be a terror and a defense. The law, which is the highest reason, boasts that every man's house is his castle; but the freedman can have no castle without the ballot. When the master knows that he may be voted down, he will know that he must be just, and everything is contained in justice. The ballot is like charity, which never faileth, and without which man is only as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The ballot is the one thing needful, without which rights of testimony and all other rights will be no better than cobwebs which the master will break through with impunity. To him who has the ballot all other things shall be given—protection, opportunity, education, a homestead. The ballot is like the Horn of Abundance, out of which overflow rights of every kind, with corn, cotton, rice, and all the fruits of the earth. Or better still, it is like the hand of the body, without which man, who is now only a little lower than the angels, must have continued only a little above the brutes. We are fearfully and wonderfully made; but as is the hand in the work of civilization, so is the ballot in the work of government. "Give me the ballot and I can move the world," may be the exclamation of the race still despoiled of this right. There is nothing which it cannot open with almost fabulous power, like that golden mistletoe, offshoot of the sturdy oak, which, in the hands of the classical adventurer, unclosed the regions of another world, and like that golden bough, it is renewed as it is used:

"One plucked away, a second branch you see:
Shoot forth in gold and glitter from the tree."

If I press these illustrations, it is only that I may bring home to your minds that supreme efficacy, which cannot be exaggerated. Though simple in character, there is nothing the ballot cannot accomplish; like that homely household lamp in Arabian story, which, at the call of its possessor, evoked a spirit, who did all things, from the building of a palace to the rocking of a cradle, and filled the air with an invisible presence. But it is as a protector that it is of immeasurable power—like a fifteen-inch Columbiad pointed from a Monitor. Ay, sir, the ballot is the Columbiad of our political life, and every citizen who has it is a full-armed Monitor.

Having pleaded for the freedman, I now plead for the Republic; for to each alike the ballot is a necessity. It is idle to expect any true peace while the freedman is robbed of this transcendent light and left a prey to that vengeance which is ready to wreak upon him the disappointment of defeat. The country, sympathetic with him, will be in a condition of perpetual unrest. With him it will suffer and with him alone can it cease to suffer. Only through him can you redress the balance of our political system and assure the safety of patriot citizens. Only through him can you save the national debt from the inevitable repudiation which awaits it when recent rebels in conjunction with Northern allies once more bear sway. He is our best guarantee. Use him. He was once your fellow-soldier; he has always been your fellow-man. If he was willing to die for the Republic he is surely good enough to vote. And now that he is ready to uphold the Republic, it will be madness to reject him. Had he voted originally, the acts of secession must have failed. Treason would have been voted down. You owe this tragical war and the debt now fastened upon the country to the denial of this right. Vacant chairs in once happy homes, innumerable graves, saddened hearts, mothers, fathers, wives, sisters, brothers, all mourning lost ones, the poor now ground by a taxation they had never known before, all testify against that injustice by which the present freedman was not allowed to vote. Had he voted there would have been peace. If he votes now there will be peace. Without this you must have a standing army, which is a sorry substitute for justice. Before you is the plain alternative of the ballot-box or the cartridge box; choose ye between them.

Reason too in every way and with every voice cries out in unison with necessity. All policies, all expediences, all economies take up the cry. Nothing so impolitic as wrong; nothing so inexpedient as tyranny; nothing so little economical as the spirit of Caste. Justice is the highest policy, the truest expediency, and the most comprehensive economy. In this inspiration act. Do you wish to save the national credit, now imperiled by fatal injustice, and especially to secure gold as the national currency? Then do not let the question of Equal Rights disturb the country with its volcanic throes. You complain that labor is unorganized and that the cotton crop has failed. Do you wish labor to smile and cotton to grow? Then sow the land with Human Rights and encircle it round about with justice. The freedman will not, cannot work, while you deny his rights. Cotton will not, cannot grow in such an atmosphere. It is absurd to expect it. In using the freedman as you now do you imitate those barbarous Irish who insisted upon plowing by the horse's tail, until an Act of Parliament interfered to require plowing by harness. The infinite folly must be corrected among us, if for no higher reason than because it is unprofitable. But it is contrary to nature, and on this account renders the whole social system insecure. Where Human Rights are set at naught there can be no tranquillity except that of force, which is despotism. This most reasonable conclusion is sustained by the philosophy of history, which, speaking by one of its oracles, the great Italian Vico tells us most sententiously that "nothing out of its natural state can either easily subsist or last long." Truer words were never uttered as a statement of philosophy or as a warning to injustice enacted into law.

GOOD AND GLORY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. President, already I have taken too much time, and still the great theme, in its various and multitudinous relations, continues to open before us. At each step it rises in some new aspect—assuming every shape of interest and of duty—now with voice of command and then with voice of persuasion. The national security, the national faith, the good of the freedman, the concerns of business, agriculture, justice, peace, reconciliation, obedience to God—such are some of the forms it takes. In the name of all these, I speak to-day, hoping to do something for my country, and especially for that unhappy portion which has been arrayed in arms against us. The people there are my fellow-citizens, and gladly would I hail them, if they would permit it, as no longer a "section," no longer "the South," but an integral part of the Republic—under a Constitution which knows no North and no South and cannot tolerate any "sectional" pretensions. Gladly do I offer my best efforts in all sincerity for their welfare. But I see clearly that there is nothing in the compass of mortal power so important to them in every respect, morally, politically, and economically—that there is nothing with such certain promise to them of beneficent results—that there is nothing so sure to make their land smile with industry and fertility as the decree of Equal Rights which I now invoke. Let the decree go forth to cover them with blessings, sure to descend upon their children in successive generations. They have given us war; we give them peace. They have ragged against us in the name of Slavery. We send them back the benediction of Justice for all. They menace hate; we offer in return all the sacred charities of country together with oblivion of the past. This is our "Measure for Measure." This is our retaliation. This is our only revenge.

And here, I hope to be pardoned if I stop for one moment to express my unflinching confidence in the triumph of the cause. Timid or perverse counsels may postpone the glad consummation; but the contest now begun can end only when slavery is completely transformed by a metamorphosis, which shall substitute Justice for Injustice, Riches for Poverty, and Beauty for Deformity. From history we learn, not only the Past, but the Future. By the study of what has been we know what must be, according to unerring law. Call it, if you please, the logic of events, and infer the inevitable conclusion. Or call it, if you please, the Rule of Three, and from the results of certain forces determine the proportionate results of increased forces. There can be no mistake in the answer. And so it is plain that the Equal Rights of All will be established. Amid all seeming vicissitudes the work goes on. Soon or late the final victory will be won. I believe soon. Speeches cannot stop it; crafty machinations cannot change it. Against its irresistible movement politicians are as impotent as those old conjurors, who imagined that,

"By rhymes they could pull down full soon,
From lofty sky the wading moon."

These verses, which shine on the black-letter page of the great lawyer, Sir Edward Coke, aptly describe the incantations of our day to pull down Justice from her lofty sky. It cannot be done. In this conviction I can observe what comes to pass without losing faith. I can listen with composure to arguments which ought not to be made, and I can see with equal composure how individual opinions hesitate between Congress and the President. It is not to the oscillations of the pendulum that we look for the measure of time, but to the face of the public clock and the striking of the church bell. The indications of that clock and the striking of that bell leave no room for doubt.

In the fearful tragedy now drawing to a close there is a destiny, stern and irresistible as that of the Greek Drama, which seems to master all that is done, hurrying on the death of Slavery and its whole brood of sin. There is also a Christian Providence which watches this battle for right, caring especially for the poor and down-trodden who have no helper. The freedman still writhing under cruel oppression now lifts his voice to God the avenger. It is for us to save ourselves from righteous judgment. Never with impunity can you outrage human nature. Our country, which is guilty still, is paying still the grievous penalty. Therefore by every motive of self-preservation we are summoned to be just. And thus is the cause associated indissolubly with the national life.

But in saving the Republic we elevate it. In overthrowing an oppressive injustice we give full scope to the principles of our government and fulfill that "Idea of a perfect Commonwealth," which has entered into the visions of philosophy and poetry. "I am all that has been, that is, and that shall be, and none among mortals has hitherto lifted my veil;" such was the enigma cut on the pavement of the temple of Minerva. For ages it remained unanswered; but the answer is now at hand. The Republic is all that has been, that is, and that shall be; and it is your duty to lift the veil. To do less than this were a failure, for such was the aspiration and promise of the Fathers when they assumed their first vows in the family of nations. To do this will fix the example of American Institutions. So long as slavery endured, it was impossible; so long as a Black Code, the wretched counterpart of slavery, endures in any form, it is impossible. To attain this idea we must proclaim the rule of Justice. Slavery thus far has been the very pivot, round which the Republic has revolved, while all its policy at home and abroad has radiated from this terrible center. Hereafter the Equal Rights of All will take the place of Slavery, and the Republic will revolve on this glorious pivot, whose infinite, far-reaching radiations will be the happiness of the Human Family. There is nothing that the imagination can picture which will not be ours. Where justice is supreme nothing can be wanting. There will be room for every business and for every charity. The fields will nod with increase; industry will be quickened to unimagined success, and life itself will be raised to a higher service. There will be that repose which comes from harmony, and also that simplicity which comes from one prevailing law, both of which are essential to the idea of the Republic. Our country will cease to be a patchwork where different States vary in the rights they accord, and will become a Plural Unit with one Constitution, one Liberty, and one Universal Franchise. With all these things the Republic will be a synonym for justice and peace, for these things will be inseparable from its name. In our longings we need not repair to philosophy or poetry. Nor need we go back to the memorable sage, who declared that the best government was where every citizen rushed to the defense of the humblest as if he were the State, for all this will be ours. Nor need we go back to that patriot king, in ancient tragedy, who, inspired by the Republican idea, exclaimed:

"The people I made supreme,
And on this city with an equal right
For all to vote, its freedom have bestowed."

Here at last, among us, all this will be assured, and the Republic will be of such renown and virtue that all at home or abroad who bear the American name may exclaim with more than Roman pride, "I am an American citizen," and if danger approaches, they may repeat the same cry with more than Roman confidence, knowing well that this title will be a sufficient protection.

EQUAL RIGHTS OF ALL.

Sir, it is for you now to determine if all this shall be fulfilled. The whole case is before you in its grandeur and in its humanity, infinite as human aspirations, beautiful as the vision of a Republic. Do not turn away from it. Vindicate the great cause, I intreat you, by the suppression of all oligarchical pretensions and the establishment of those Equal Rights, without which Republican Government is a name only, and nothing more. Strike at the Black Code, as you have already struck at the Slave Code. There is nothing to choose between them. Strike at once; strike hard. You have already proclaimed Emancipation; proclaim Enfranchisement also. And do not stultify yourselves by setting at naught the practical principle of the Fathers, that all just government stands only on the consent of the governed, and its inseparable corollary, that taxation without representation is tyranny. What was once true is true forever, although we may for a time lose sight of it, and this is the case with those imperishable truths to which you have been, alas! so indifferent. Thus far the work is only half done. See that it is finished. Save the freedman from the outrage which is his daily life. As a slave he was "a tool without a soul." If you have ceased to treat him according to this ancient definition, it is only because you treat him even as something less. In your cruel philosophy he is only a "cipher," without the protection which the slave sometimes found in the self-interest of the master, or, rather let me say he is only a "cipher" where rights are concerned, but a numeral counted by millions where taxes are to be paid. The freedman is compelled not only to pay taxes; he must fight also, and he must obey the laws; three things which he cannot escape. But, according to the primal principle of Republican Government, he has an indefeasible right to a voice in determining how to be taxed, when to fight, and what laws to obey, all of which can be secured only through the ballot. Thus again, do I return to the same conclusion, which meets us at every point and every stage, as a commandment which cannot be disobeyed.

Would you secure all the just fruits of this terrible war and trample out the Rebellion in its pernicious assumptions, as in its arms? Then do not hesitate; and this is the last stage of the argument. The Rebellion began in two assumptions, both proceeding from South Carolina: first, the sovereignty of the States, with the pretended right of secession; and, secondly, the superiority of the white race, with the pretended right of Caste, Oligarchy, and Monopoly, on account of color. The first was often announced in every way. The second showed itself at the beginning, when South Carolina alone, among the thirteen States, allowed her Constitution to be degraded by an exclusion on account of color; but it did not receive an authoritative statement until a later day, when that wicked evangelist, Mr. Calhoun, taking issue with the Declaration of Independence, audaciously announced in the Senate that to declare all were born free and equal was "the most dangerous of all political errors; and that it had done more to retard the cause of civilization, and is doing more at present than all other causes combined; that we now begin to experience the danger of admitting so great an error to have a place in the Declaration of Independence." (Calhoun's Speeches, vol. iv, p. 54.) These two assumptions are kindred in effrontery. All agree that the dogma of State sovereignty must be repelled; but this is less offensive than that other dogma, having the same origin, that the Declaration of Independence is "the most dangerous of all political errors." To repel such an effrontery is not enough; it must be scorned.

The gospel, according to Calhoun, is only another statement of the imposture, that this august Republic, founded to sustain the rights of Human Nature, is nothing but "a white man's Government." The whole assumption is ignoble, utterly unsupported by history, and insulting to the Fathers, while it is offensively illogical and irreligious. It is illogical, inasmuch as our fathers, when they declared that all men are created equal, gave expression to a truth of political science, which, from the nature of the case, admits no exception. As an axiom it is without exception; for it is the essence of an axiom, whether in geometry or morals, to be universal. As an abstract truth it is also without exception, according to the requirement of such truth. And finally, as a self-evident truth, so announced in the great Declaration, it is without exception; for only such truth can be self-evident. Thus, whether axiom, abstract truth, or self-evident truth, it is always universal. But the assumption is not only illogical, it is irreligious, inasmuch as it flies in the face of that living truth which appears twice at the Creation: first, when God said, "Let us make man in our image;" and, secondly, in the Unity of the race, then divinely appointed, and which appears again in the gospel, when it said, "God that made the world, and all things therein, hath made of one blood all nations of men." According to the best testimony now, the population of the earth—embracing Caucasians, Mongolians, Malays, Africans, and Americans—is about thirteen hundred millions, of whom only three hundred and seventy-five millions are "white men," or little less than one fourth, so that, in claiming exclusive rights for "white men," you degrade nearly three-quarters of the Human Family, made in the "image of God" and declared to be of "one blood," while you sanction a Caste offensive to religion, an Oligarchy inconsistent with Republican Government, and a Monopoly which has the whole world as its footstool.

Against this assumption I protest with mind, soul, and heart. It is false in religion, false in statesmanship, and false in economy. It is an extravagance, which, if enforced, is foolish tyranny. Show me a creature, with erect countenance looking to heaven, made in the image of God, and I show you a man, who, of whatever country or race, whether darkened by equatorial sun or blanched by northern cold, is with you a child of the Heavenly Father, and equal with you in title to all the rights of Human Nature. You cannot deny these rights without impiety. And so has God linked the national welfare with national duty, you cannot deny these rights without peril to the Republic. It is not enough that you have given Liberty. By the same title that we claim Liberty do we claim Equality also. One cannot be denied without the other. What is Liberty without Equality? What is Equality without Liberty? One is the complement of the other. The two are necessary to round and complete the circle of American citizenship. They are the two lobes of the mighty lungs through which the people breathe the breath of life. They are the two vital principles of a Republican Government, without which a Government, although republican in name, cannot be republican in fact. These two vital principles belong to those divine statutes which are graven on the heart of Universal Man, even upon the heart of the slave who forgets them, and upon the heart of the master who denies them; and whether forgotten or denied, they are more enduring than marble or brass, for they share the perpetuity of the Human Family.

The Roman Cato, after declaring his belief in the immortality of the soul, added, that if this were an error, it was an error which he loved. And now, declaring my belief in Liberty and Equality as the God-given birthright of all men, let me say, in the same spirit, if this be an error, it is an error which I love; if this be a fault, it is a fault which I shall be slow to renounce; if this be an illusion, it is an allusion which I pray may wrap the world in its angelic forms.

Mr. FESSENDEN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it important to have an executive session, and if it is agreeable to my colleague, I will make that motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a matter of indifference to me.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that we have anything pressing in executive session, and if the Senator from Maine will yield the floor I should like to let this subject pass over informally and take up a little bill—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to my honorable friend that it is very important that we should have an executive session this afternoon.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I shall not object.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COST OF NAVY-YARD AT PHILADELPHIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury in regard to the cost of the navy-yard at Philadelphia, in response to a resolution of the House of January 11, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INCOME FROM PROPERTY IN THE FUNDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of Hon. S. S. Hayes, of the United States revenue commission, upon the income derived from property in the funds and taxation generally.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved that the letter of the Secretary, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that the Secretary's letter be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. As the Secretary of the Treasury differs from the report of the commissioner, perhaps the letter of the Secretary had better be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 5, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you a report from Hon. S. S. Hayes, a member of the United States revenue commission, upon the property in the funds and the income derived therefrom as a source of national revenue, the financial system of the United States, the creation of a sinking fund, and taxation in general.

The subjects upon which Mr. Hayes treats have been carefully considered, and his views are very ably and clearly presented in this report. I cannot indorse his conclusions; but it is due to him and the importance of the subject which he discusses that his report should be presented to and carefully considered by Congress.

I am very truly yours,

H. McCULLOCH.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WENTWORTH's motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask to introduce a joint resolution for publication of notices of mail lettings. It provides that the yearly advertisements and proposals to carry the mails of the United States, including the present year, shall be published for a period of six weeks in one newspaper printed in each congressional district in the several States where the mail service is to be performed.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will not ask a vote without first hearing the views of the Post Office Department. The law as it now stands was designed to effect a very considerable reduction in the printing expenses of the Department. The mail lettings are now published in pamphlet form and distributed to all the post offices and to contractors for the mails, besides the publication in newspapers. The notice now is just as effectually advertised for the interests of the Government as it would be in the way proposed. We ought not to return without good cause to the old plan, with its increased expenditures.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It does not restore the old plan. At present the law provides that they shall be published in not exceeding five newspapers in every State and Territory. The operation of the law is to publish them in five newspapers in each State without reference to its size, so that in the small States they are published in five newspapers, while in the very large States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, they are published in but five.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman is in error about the publication in the small States being in five papers. A smaller number of papers is selected in the small States, as I am informed. Without intending any discourtesy, I hope the gentleman will allow me to make objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects, and it is therefore not before the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Iowa consents that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The joint resolution was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

VICE ADMIRAL DAVID G. FARRAGUT.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 25, tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay, on the 5th of August, 1864; which was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the joint resolution, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL ACADEMY STUDENTS.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and are hereby, requested to inquire into the propriety of so changing the law and regulations of the Naval Academy as to admit students therein up to the age of twenty-one years, so as to accord with those admitted into the Military Academy.

Bronze Doors of the Capitol.

The SPEAKER. Before the House proceeds to the regular order, the Chair desires to state that some Senators have stated to him that the bronze doors between the wings of the Capitol leading to the old Hall of the House of Representatives have been injured to some extent, and the Chair has found that one or two swords have been taken from the statuettes. The Chair, therefore, asks consent to refer the whole matter to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the committee also inquire whether the Halls shall be occupied with little dry-goods and cake stands.

Mr. STEVENS. And I would like to have them examine and report what that monster is out there. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The inquiry should embrace the whole subject.

The SPEAKER. All those subjects will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and they may report to the House.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the various propositions relating to the Freedmen's Bureau, on which the previous question was demanded and seconded yesterday, and the main question ordered. The Clerk will now report the propositions in their order.

The Clerk read the amendments proposed, namely, first, that of Mr. SMITH, excepting from the operation of the bill the State of Kentucky; second, the substitute offered by Mr. STEVENS; and lastly, the substitute for the Senate bill reported by the committee.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment as proposed by Mr. SMITH; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 181, not voting 17; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—181.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Blaine, Blow, Culver, Davis, Denison, Goodyear, Griswold, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Noel, Radford, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, and Winfield—17.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the substitute offered by Mr. STEVENS for the substitute reported from the committee on freedmen.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 126, not voting 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baldwin, Banks, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Garfield, Henderson, Higby, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Jenekes, Julian, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Moorhead, Morris, Paine, Sawyer, Schenck, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Van Aernam, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, DeFrees, Delano, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Thayer, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright—126.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Bergen, Blow, Culver, Denison, Goodyear, Hart, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Morrill, Pike, Radford, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, and Winfield—19.

So the substitute of Mr. STEVENS was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CONKLING said: I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. HULBURD, is absent, by the leave of the House, in consequence of the illness of a near relative. I make this statement in reference to all these votes.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER said: My colleague, Mr. ANCONA, is still absent on account of sickness. I am authorized to say that he would have voted against all these propositions.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on the substitute reported from the select committee on freedmen, and, being put, said substitute was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELIOT demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 33, not voting 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—136.

NAYS—Messrs. Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Wright—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Buckland, Culver, Denison, Goodyear, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Radford, Sloan, Voorhees, and Winfield—13.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BOYER stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, was unavoidably absent. If here, he would undoubtedly have voted in the negative.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. ELIOT moved to amend the title of the bill so as to read as follows: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending 30th January, 1866; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Wednesday, the 15th instant; after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

VINDICATION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, on yesterday, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary Senate bill No. 61, to protect all persons in their civil rights and to furnish the means of their vindication.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a personal explanation. Before doing so I will ask the Clerk to read a paragraph which I have marked in the report of yesterday's debate, as published in the Daily Globe of this morning.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. GRINNELL. History repeats itself. I care not whether the gentleman was four years in the war on the Union side or four years on the other side; but I say that he degraded his State and uttered a sentiment I thought unworthy of an American officer when he said that he would do such an act on the complaint of a negro against him."

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I did not use the language imputed to me by the member from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.] And I pronounce the assertion that has just been read, that I have degraded my State and uttered a sentiment unworthy an American officer, to be false, a vile slander, and unworthy to be uttered by any gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no explanation further than to say that the gentleman has withheld his remarks, and that I have published mine. I alluded to his remarks as I understood them, and stated distinctly that I had no desire to do the gentleman any injustice. I criticised his language as I understood it, and I stand by that criticism. If I did not represent his language correctly, then I make an apology to him in regard to that. But if I understood his language correctly I make no apology for my criticism of it.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. My object was not to obtain an apology from the gentleman, but to say what I have said.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have only to say that the gentleman's language is no offense to me. I stand here to discharge my duties as I understand they should be discharged, and I stand upon my rights as a member of this House, and when I criticised the laws of Kentucky I did so from a sense of my duty; and when I characterized the language of the gentleman as I did, it was because I believed it was unworthy of an American officer, and unworthy of his noble State; and I do not consider that he represented the spirit of the loyal army of the country when he declared he would shoot a citizen because that citizen might have informed against him.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I see the gentleman does not appreciate his position more than he appreciates mine. I understand the gentleman is a preacher of the Gospel. But he has got to learn that charity that all other men understand. I am a new member here, but I have always endeavored to deport myself with the utmost courtesy and kindness toward every gentleman upon this floor. And it does seem to me that it came with exceeding ill grace from gentlemen who have sat in their houses, who have remained in the bosoms of their families in that safety which we were fighting for in the battlefield, to come here and not exercise even ordinary charity toward us, but, finding a member out of his seat, proceed to assail him, first by putting words in his mouth he did not use, and then offer him an insult on account of those words. I say the gentleman does not appreciate my position nor his own; and I tell him that; but that is his fault, and not mine.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have only to say that the gentleman has paraded his profession of arms before this House. I have not paraded mine. If he says that I am a clergyman, or was a minister, I have to answer that I was a man before I was a minister; and I claim now to be a man and an American citizen. I am not ashamed of my origin or of my profession. I am here to stand up for my principles and for my constituents and for my country.

EQUAL POLITICAL RIGHTS.

Mr. MORRIS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to secure equal political rights to every citizen of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BERKELEY AND JEFFERSON COUNTIES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House sometime ago recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia. I desire that a vote may be taken on this subject. I hope that the motion to reconsider will be agreed to. I think there will be no objection to it. I trust that then the joint resolution will be passed.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the motion to reconsider. If that be adopted, the question will then recur on recommending the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. If that be determined in the negative, the question will recur upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the motion to recommit, it was determined in the negative.

The question then recurring on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, recites in its preamble, that the General Assembly of Virginia, by an act passed on the 31st day of January, 1863, gave its consent to the county of Berkeley, of that State "being admitted to and becoming part of the State of West Virginia," and by an act passed on the 4th day of February, 1863, did, among other things, give its consent to the county of Jefferson, of said State, "being admitted to and becoming part of the State of West Virginia," which acts authorized the qualified voters thereof to hold an election within those counties on the 28th day of May, 1863, to ascertain the sense of said voters with respect to the transfer of those counties from Virginia to the State of West Virginia.

The preamble further states that the Governor of Virginia, in accordance with a further provision of the acts cited, did, on the 22d day of July, 1863, certify to the Governor of West Virginia that polls were opened in the county of Berkeley, on the 28th day of May, 1863, "for the purpose indicated in said act" of January 31, 1863, and that "a very large majority of the votes cast at said election were in favor of said county of Berkeley becoming part of the State of West Virginia;" and did, on the 14th day of September, 1863, certify to the Governor of West Virginia that polls were opened in the county of Jefferson on the 28th day of May, 1863, "on the question of annexation to said new State," and that "a very large majority of the votes cast at said election were in favor of annexation to the State of West Virginia."

The preamble also recites that the Legislature of West Virginia, by an act passed on the 5th day of August, 1863, did admit the county of Berkeley into and make it a part of the State of West Virginia; and, by an act passed on the 2d day of November, 1863, did admit the county of Jefferson into and make it part of the State of West Virginia; and that the State of West Virginia has, from the date of said acts of the Legislature thereof, exercised full and undisputed jurisdiction over said counties.

The joint resolution declares that the consent of Congress is given to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson from Virginia to the State of West Virginia; that the jurisdiction exercised over them by the State of West Virginia is approved and confirmed, and that those counties are henceforth part of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The resolution

now before the House proposes to give the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia. When the resolution was reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of January last, it was accompanied by a written report, which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed for the information of members of the House. Anything which I might now say upon this subject would simply be a repetition of what is contained in that report. I will, however, state in very brief terms the facts upon which it is asked that the consent of Congress shall be given to the transfer of these counties.

On the 19th of June, 1863, if I am not mistaken in the date, the constitution of West Virginia took effect under the proclamation of the President of the United States. It contained a provision authorizing the transfer of the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley from the State of Virginia to the State of West Virginia. That was a fundamental provision of the constitution itself. On the 31st of January, 1863, the State of Virginia passed an act authorizing the transfer of Berkeley county to West Virginia on a vote of the people of that county; and on the 4th of February, 1863, the State of Virginia passed an act authorizing the transfer of Jefferson county upon a vote of the people of that county.

In pursuance of those laws, a vote was taken in each of those counties, which vote resulted in favor of the transfer. The result of that vote was duly certified; and, from that time until the present, these counties have, by common consent, been regarded as constituting a part of the State of West Virginia. They have been so regarded upon the ground that their transfer from the State of West Virginia was authorized by the constitution of West Virginia; and that, therefore, the assent of Congress was not requisite. As, however, a question has been made whether the transfer would be valid without the consent of Congress, this joint resolution has been introduced, and reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, merely for the purpose of settling the controverted question as to whether the assent of Congress is or is not necessary to the transfer. All the departments of the government of Virginia and West Virginia, and the executive department, at least, of the Government of the United States, have recognized the transfer as already made. The courts which are held there are held under the jurisdiction and laws of the State of West Virginia. Judgments have been rendered; transfers of property have been made; criminals have been tried and sentenced; and in every possible form the transfer has been regarded as complete.

Now, I do not wish to detain the House by any further statement of the facts, because I suppose it to be wholly unnecessary. My colleague on the committee, the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] desires, I believe, to submit some remarks in opposition to the resolution; and I will yield to him for half an hour, which I hope will enable him to say all he desires to say; and then, if any further explanation be necessary, I may ask the privilege of saying a few words in reply to him. Before doing so, however, I desire to state an additional fact. It is exceedingly important that this matter should be disposed of now. The Legislature of West Virginia, on the 1st of February last, adopted resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, asking the action of Congress, so that this controverted subject may be settled.

Resolutions of the Legislature of West Virginia.

Whereas, on the 31st day of January, A. D. 1863, the Legislature of the State of Virginia passed a law giving the consent of said State to the county of Berkeley becoming part of the State of West Virginia, and authorizing a vote to be taken, in said county, on the fourth Thursday of May, 1863, upon the question of annexing said county to the State of West Virginia; and whereas, on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1863, a like law was passed by the Legislature of the State of Virginia authorizing the people of Jefferson county on the same day to take a vote upon annexing said county of Jefferson to the State of West Virginia; and whereas, on the said fourth Thursday of May, A. D. 1863, a vote was taken in each of said counties in pursuance of said laws upon the question of annexing said counties to the State of West Virginia, and a majority of the votes cast in each of said counties was in favor of said annexation; and whereas, on the 22d day of July, A. D. 1863, His Excellency, Francis H. Pickens, then, and still, Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, certified to the Governor of the State of West Virginia, under his hand and the less seal of said State, that from the returns on file in his office a very large majority of the votes cast at said elections in said counties was in favor of said annexation; and whereas, on the 5th day of August, A. D. 1863, the Legislature of West Virginia passed a law accepting the transfer and annexation of said county of Berkeley to the said State of West Virginia; and whereas, on the 2d day of November, A. D. 1863, the Legislature of West Virginia passed a like law accepting the transfer and annexation of said county of Jefferson to the said State of West Virginia; and whereas ever since the passage of these laws the State of West Virginia, and the various State, county, and township officers of said State, have continually exercised exclusive and undisputed jurisdiction, and all the acts of municipal sovereignty necessary for the good government of said counties; and whereas it has been recently claimed and insisted that the transfer and annexation of said counties was not valid and complete until the same was ratified by Congress; and whereas the doubts and uncertainty created by such claims and representations tend greatly to create a spirit of insubordination and disloyalty to the laws and government of the State; therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of West Virginia. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the speedy passage of a bill or joint resolution by Congress giving its consent to the annexation and transfer of said counties to the State of West Virginia, ratifying and approving the same.

Resolved. That the Governor be requested to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing resolution.

Adopted January 13, 1866.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF DELEGATES,
WHEELING, January 22, 1866.

I certify that the foregoing is a true transcript from the record in this office.

WILLIAM P. HUBBARD,
Clerk House of Delegates and Keeper of the Rolls.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the less seal of the State, [L. S.] at my said office in the city of Wheeling, this 25th day of January, 1866.

GRANVILLE D. HALL,
Secretary of State.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the honorable gentleman who reported this bill will not confine me to half an hour. I cannot state my objections in thirty minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I think that half an hour will be enough.

Mr. ROGERS. I am indebted to the gentleman's courtesy for the time I am to occupy; and as I am the only member of the committee who opposes the bill, I hope I will be allowed to have full time to state my objections and the reasons for them.

The SPEAKER. There are forty-five minutes of the gentleman's hour left.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this is an application to Congress to give its consent to a transfer of Jefferson and Berkeley counties from old Virginia to West Virginia, some two years after that transfer was supposed to have been made. It was supposed, according to the theory of the report of the committee, that it was unnecessary to have any action on the part of Congress to ratify and consent to the transfer of a part of old Virginia to West Virginia. The report goes upon the hypothesis that the government under Governor Peirpoint was a government de jure, and that therefore any act of old Virginia under Governor Peirpoint consenting to the transfer of any part of its territory to West Virginia was an act of the sovereign power of old Virginia, and legal.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman assumes, as has been done several times upon the other side of the House, that West Virginia was recognized by the vote of the Republican portion of the House, upon the ground of the consent of the State of Virginia to the organization of the State of West Virginia. I am not, sir, prepared to say there were not some gentlemen upon this side of the House who voted upon that ground; but I am prepared to say that there was one who did not, that there were others who did not, and that there was one who appealed, in casting his vote in that way, that he should not be misunderstood, and many others responded, saying they could not stultify themselves by assenting to the idea that the State of Virginia was in a condition to consent. We voted for her admission because the people of this portion of our territory had organized a State, and came to Congress asking for admission into the Union, and believing we had the right to admit them, as they had arranged all the proper preliminaries, we did so admit them. I wish to enter my protest against the idea being sent abroad any further, that our action recognizes Virginia as having the right to consent to anything which should be made a condition for the action of this Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. The report of the committee, unanimous, except so far as I am concerned, bases the authority of Congress to recognize the transfer of a part of old Virginia to West Virginia upon the ground that the State of old Virginia was a State de jure under Governor Peirpoint. It is asserted she had the right to transfer any portion of her territory, because she was a State de jure; and that by virtue of that fact old Virginia was recognized by all the departments of the Federal Government, and all the necessary machinery of government was carried on in old Virginia as in any other State of the Union. But when they came to another part of the case, and it is the main point, and it is asked whether it does not require the consent of old Virginia, West Virginia, and the Congress of the United States at the same identical moment to carry into effect a tripartite agreement for the transfer of a part of old Virginia to West Virginia, then they say it is doubtful whether Virginia is more than a mere government de facto.

Now, gentlemen will remember that the State of Virginia, before Congress had taken any action on this subject at all, several months ago, and since the war ended, passed a solemn act of her Legislature under her new constitution, counting these two counties into the State of old Virginia, and refusing her consent to the transfer of these counties to the State of West Virginia. That was before Congress had taken any action on this subject at all. The main question in this case then arises, whether that did not end the proposed agreement. I desire that you may regard this question as you would between any other two States; because it is an important one, in which not only the citizens of the State of West Virginia, old Virginia, and all the other States are particularly concerned, namely, whether a State, although it has given its consent that a part of its territory shall be given up to another State, may not withdraw that consent at any time before the other party, whose consent is necessary to make a legal arrangement between the parties, shall have given its consent; I mean by the other party the Congress of the United States.

Now, I hold that if the State of old Virginia was a sovereign State, if she was a State de jure at the time of the formation of the government of Virginia under Governor Peirpoint, she is a State de jure to-day, and that the authority which she exercised in taking away the consent which she had before given to the transfer of a part of her territory to West Virginia was a sovereign exercise of authority, which she had a right to make; and if she withdrew it at any time before Congress gave its consent—I mean the third party whose consent was required in order to complete the contract—then the contract was not completed and the grant was unexecuted.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I would like to ask my colleague on the committee whether the contract had not been ratified before this repeal by the old State of Virginia, which I understand occurred on the first day of the convening of the present session.

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir, it was not ratified. Congress never has given any ratification or consent, directly or indirectly, to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley or Jefferson to West Virginia.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I merely want to know whether that ratification was not performed by all parties except the consent of Congress before the repeal of the law or grant by those States, and was not the jurisdiction of the two counties transferred?

Mr. ROGERS. The transfer of the jurisdiction of the two counties was not complete, and West Virginia had no right by law to exercise any authority over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson until Congress had given its consent to the transfer. The act of Virginia authorizing the establishment of the State of West Virginia, reserved in the act the control and jurisdiction of those counties until Congress should give its consent to the acquisition of that territory by the State of West Virginia; and until that time the transfer was not complete. But these two counties were not included in the act of Congress. It is a condition of the act that Congress shall ratify the act of old Virginia consenting to the erection of West Virginia, and until Congress consents to the erection of that State, old Virginia has the entire and exclusive control and jurisdiction over the whole of the original State.

Mr. LATHAM. I wish to correct a mistake of the gentleman in regard to the act to which he refers, and which is now the matter under consideration by the House—not the act authorizing the erection of a new State. The act under consideration now, giving consent to the transfer of the two counties, was a subject which took place at a period subsequent to the act of the State of Virginia giving its consent to the establishment of the State of West Virginia and its admission into the Union by Congress. The act which gives the consent of the State of Virginia to the transfer of these two counties, states that the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia over these counties shall cease upon their admission by the State of West Virginia, without the consent of Congress. And the jurisdiction did so cease, was voluntarily withdrawn by their authorities, and the jurisdiction of West Virginia extended over them immediately upon their admission by the State of West Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read the act.

Mr. ROGERS. That will not be disputed; that is not the point I am making. The point is, that when West Virginia was put into an independent position as a State, old Virginia stated in her act giving her consent that she should have entire sovereign control over every foot of that State until Congress gave its ratification to the contract between the two States, and that originally, when West Virginia was admitted as a sovereign State into this Union, it was upon the express condition that certain counties, naming them, should constitute the new State, and that these counties remained subject to the sole control of the State of old Virginia. Now, suppose that at any time after old Virginia had given its consent, and before Congress had given its consent, and entered into the agreement necessary to complete the transfer, old Virginia had withdrawn her consent, could she not have done it? Is there a lawyer in this House who will say to me that although a State may consent to the transfer of a portion of its territory to another State on condition that she shall hold sovereign power over that territory till Congress recognizes the act, that she has not the right at any time before Congress ratifies the agreement to withdraw her consent from that contemplated contract? Is it in the eye of the law a consummated contract at any time unless the three parties consent and agree to the contract at the same identical time. Either party has a right to withdraw its consent at any time before the agreement is fully consummated.

Mr. LATHAM. I will just state that upon the admission of West Virginia into the Union there was no contract between Virginia and West Virginia. There could be none, because West Virginia had no existence until admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States, and consequently it followed, as a matter of course, that the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia should be extended over all the territory which was erected into the State of West Virginia until West Virginia became a State by admission into the Union by the Congress of the United States. There could be no agreement between the States until West Virginia became a State. After the act authorizing West Virginia to become a State in the Union, the Legislature of Virginia provided by two separate acts for the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, a clause of one of which reads thus:

"If a majority of the votes at the polls opened and held pursuant to this act be in favor of the said county of Berkeley becoming part of the State of West Virginia, then shall the said county become part of the said State of West Virginia when admitted into the same with the consent of the Legislature thereof."

Mr. ROGERS. We do not disagree at all upon that part of the case about the counties. I am coming to that directly, but that is not the point now. As to the point the gentleman raises, that because West Virginia had not then been established as a State, no contract could have been made between the States of West Virginia and old Virginia. Now, that is not so, because, under the Constitution of the United States, no State has a right to give up one inch of its territory to any political community, organized body, State, or Territory, or to any citizen, without the consent of Congress. And why? Because the citizens of the United States, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, are interested in the dismemberment and disintegration of the territory of the United States. No State can give up one foot of its territory to any other State, corporation, political body, or living individual without the consent of Congress as a party to the contract.

In support of this position I read from a case reported in 18 Howard, page 494, decided in the United States Supreme Court:

"By the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution, no State can enter into any agreement or compact with another State without the consent of Congress. Now, a question of boundary between States is in its nature a political question, to be settled by compact made by the political departments of the Government."

"And if Florida and Georgia had, by negotiation and agreement, proceeded to adjust this boundary, any compact between them would have been null and void without the assent of Congress."

I say that any agreement between the States of old Virginia and West Virginia with regard to the transfer of Berkeley and Jefferson counties was null and void. Every act, therefore, of the State of West Virginia exercising jurisdiction over these two counties was in violation of law and a usurpation. West Virginia has no more right to exercise the functions of a State over these counties than she would have over the State of New Jersey or any other State in the Union.

I read further:

"This provision is obviously intended to guard the rights and interests of the other States, and to prevent any compact or agreement between any two States which might affect injuriously the interests of the others. And the right and duty to protect those interests is vested in the General Government."

The Constitution of the United States, section three, article four, says no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of Congress. Now, West Virginia could be established in old Virginia by an act of the Legislatures and the consent of Congress, provided the organic law of the State authorized the Legislature so to do.

Now, I have another case here, a case which the committee have referred to in their report, and by which they attempt to sustain the position they take upon this point, and which shows point blank to the contrary, that that position is not tenable. No gentleman on the other side of the House, however prejudiced, can doubt that the position I take is tenable and cannot be contradicted or overthrown by any one. The tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides that no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State. Now, I hold that a Legislature of a State cannot transfer the territory of the State unless the State constitution provides for the act; and old Virginia having no such provision in her constitution, her consent to the transfer of these counties was void.

The committee refer to the case of Kentucky and Virginia, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States. And I am going to read that part of the case to which they refer. They refer to the case for the purpose of showing that because there was a provision in the constitution of West Virginia, that other territory might be added to that State with the consent of her Legislature. Therefore, when Congress admitted West Virginia into the Union as a State, it admitted her with the right to add territory to the State as she pleased without any further action by Congress at all. The committee proceed upon the assumption, in their report, that because there is a provision in the organic law of West Virginia that new territory may be added to it afterward by act of its Legislature, that gives West Virginia the right, and the unlimited right—because if you admit the principle at all, you must admit it as an unlimited right—to add all the territory she may see fit to add. And she may take in the whole of old Virginia; she may take in all the State of Maryland; she may take in all of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and so on until she has absorbed the whole Union in one conglomerated mass of sovereign power and jurisdiction without the consent of Congress, by annexing it to the State of West Virginia. If the theory and construction of the organic law of West Virginia is correct as given by the committee, if you admit the doctrine that because the constitution of West Virginia contains a clause giving the right to add new territory, she may annex these two counties without the consent of Congress, then you must go the whole length of allowing her to add all the territory of the United States if she sees fit, without the consent of Congress; and thereby destroy the whole unity of the States of this Government, and consolidate them under the name of the State of West Virginia. No lawyer will pretend that is so. It does not require a lawyer to see the absolute absurdity of any such theory as that upon which the hypothesis set forth in this report of the committee is based. That clause in the organic law of West Virginia simply authorized the Legislature to do what it could not do without it.

Allow me to read from Wheaton's Reports, volume eighth, in regard to the separation of Kentucky from Virginia, from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States:

"The first objection is founded upon the allegation that the compact was made without the consent of Congress, contrary to the tenth section of the first article, which declares that 'no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power.' Let it be observed, in the first place, that the Constitution makes no provision respecting the mode or form in which the consent of Congress is to be signified, very properly leaving that matter to the wisdom of that body, to be decided upon according to the ordinary rules of law and of right reason. The only question in cases which involve that point is, has Congress, by some positive act, in relation to such agreement, signified the consent of that body to its validity? Now, how stands the present case? The compact was entered into between Virginia and the people of Kentucky upon the express condition that the General Government should, prior to a certain day, assent to the erection of the district of Kentucky into an independent State, and agree that the proposed State should immediately after a certain day, or at some convenient time future thereto, be admitted into the Federal Union. On the 25th of July, 1790, the convention of that district assembled under the provisions of the law of Virginia, and declared its assent to the terms and conditions prescribed by the proposed compact; and that the same was accepted as a solemn compact, and that the said district should become a separate State on the 1st of June, 1792. These resolutions, accompanied by a memorial from the convention, being communicated by the President of the United States to Congress, a report was made by a committee to whom the subject was referred, setting forth the agreement of Virginia that Kentucky should be erected into a State, upon certain terms and conditions, and the acceptance by Kentucky upon the terms and conditions so prescribed; and on the 4th of February, 1791, Congress passed an act which, after referring to the compact, and the acceptance of it by Kentucky, declares the consent of that body to the erecting of the said district into a separate and independent State, upon a certain day, and receiving her into the Union."

Here is what the court say:

"Now, it is perfectly clear that, although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed separation—"

Now, mark the theory of the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.] He asks me whether this contract was not complete between these two States without the ratification of Congress, and whether the grant has not been carried into effect, so that it cannot be recalled by the party that gave the grant. Now, I affirm that it can be recalled; it is not complete, because Congress may refuse its assent to the admission of any State; and if Congress can refuse its assent, can a compact, an agreement or a grant between parties, depending upon that assent, be completely and definitely fulfilled until that assent is given by the third party, who is to enter into the agreement as one of the parties?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will ask my friend from New Jersey whether the contracting parties, West Virginia and "old Virginia," as he calls it, the one making the grant and the other receiving it, had not done all that they could do before the repeal of this grant by the Legislature of the so-called present State of Virginia. I think that all the gentleman's law could be answered, even though "old Virginia" were so far in the Union as a State as to make her ordinances valid at the time when she passed the recent act of repeal. But so far from that, I believe that any act that she might pass would have no control over the acts passed by a State which was at the time of the passage of the act recognized by the General Government as being a State in the Union; for when the last act was passed, although as a State she was not in the sense that some contend out of the Union, yet she was in such a condition that she had not the power to pass ordinances and laws of any binding force either upon Congress or the country.

I will say in addition, that the Legislature which passed the recent act of repeal was organized without taking the oath of office which has been prescribed by Congress or by its own constitution.

Mr. ROGERS. The present Legislature was organized under Governor Peirpoint and is now recognized as the Legislature of the State of Virginia de jure, by the President and other officers of the Federal Government, and she holds her powers to legislate now under and by the same authority she did when she passed the act giving her consent to the transfer, and by virtue of that same power she has withdrawn her consent and repealed her former law.

I ask the gentleman this question: suppose that we had had no war; that we had continued in peace and prosperity, and that old Virginia had passed an act of her Legislature to transfer a portion of her territory to West Virginia; that West Virginia had made a constitution similar to this, and that before Congress had given its consent old Virginia had withdrawn her consent from that proposed compact or agreement, would she not have had a right to do so at any time before Congress ratified that contract?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will state, then, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of law, that if there were in this grant conditions precedent to be performed by the other party before the grant should become operative, then, if the conditions precedent were not performed, the grant might fall. But I contend that the ratification by Congress is not a condition precedent, and that such ratification subsequent to the full acceptance of the grant by the contracting parties is all that is necessary.

Mr. ROGERS. I will ask the gentleman one question. Could the grant be complete, and would a State have a right to take possession of the territory of another State, by virtue of acts of the Legislatures, before Congress had given its consent, and would the acts of that State over territory of the other State be legal without the consent of Congress?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I can only answer the gentleman by referring to what I have already said.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, sir, let me proceed with the decision I attempted to read. The court decides, and it is the Supreme Court of the United States, as follows:

"Now, it is perfectly clear, that although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed separation, yet they had no authority to declare Kentucky a separate and independent State, without the assent of Virginia, or upon terms variant from those which Virginia had prescribed."

I ask what authority the Congress of the United States has this day to declare these two counties a part of the State of West Virginia without the consent of old Virginia. There is the point, the very point which is raised in this case, which the learned gentleman who made this report has referred to as sustaining his report. What right, I ask, has the Congress of the United States to ratify an act upon the part of West Virginia and old Virginia, which has been revoked upon the part of old Virginia, who has expressly withdrawn her consent before Congress has had an opportunity to express its assent.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman will not cut me off here.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. How much time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. ROGERS. Half an hour more.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I do not object if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course not.

Mr. HALE. I hope that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey will be extended half an hour, and that it will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me conclude reading the extract which I had commenced. It is the case of Green vs. Biddle:

"Now, it is perfectly clear, that although Congress might have refused their consent to the proposed separation, yet they had no authority to declare Kentucky a separate and independent State, without the assent of Virginia, or upon terms variant from those which Virginia had prescribed. But Congress, after recognizing the conditions upon which alone Virginia agreed to the separation, expressed by a solemn act the consent of that body to the separation. The terms and conditions, then, on which alone the separation could take place, or the act of Congress become a valid one, were necessarily assented to, not by a mere tacit acquiescence, but by an express declaration of the legislative mind, resulting from the manifest construction of the act itself. To deny this is to deny the validity of the act of Congress, without which Kentucky could not have become an independent State; and then it would follow that she is at this moment a part of the State of Virginia, and all her laws are acts of usurpation."

I want gentlemen to mark that.

The court further say:

"The counsel who urged this argument would not, we are persuaded, consent to this conclusion; and yet it would seem to be inevitable, if the premises insisted upon be true.

This decision shows that, until Congress gives its consent to the transfer of one part of a State to another, all the acts of the other over the new territory are usurpations. It has no right or power then until Congress has given its consent to that exercise of power.

But, sir, the Congress of the United States never gave its consent to the admission of West Virginia upon any theory that the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson were to form a part of the new State. I have the act of Congress for the admission of the State of West Virginia into the Union, which, whether purposely or otherwise, has been omitted from the report of the committee. It provides as follows:

"Whereas the people inhabiting that portion of Virginia known as West Virginia did, by a convention assembled in the city of Wheeling on the 20th of November, 1861, frame for themselves a constitution, with a view of becoming a separate and independent State; and whereas at a general election held in the counties composing the territory above said on the 3d day of March last the said constitution was approved and adopted by the qualified voters of the proposed State; and whereas the Legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 13th day of May, 1862, did give its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the said State of Virginia, to be known by the name of West Virginia, and to embrace the following-named counties:"

The act then designates the forty-eight counties which are to compose the State of West Virginia; and among them we nowhere find mention made of the counties named in the pending joint resolution; and they are not included in the forty-eight counties which Congress agrees shall constitute West Virginia. It does not name the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson.

The committee say this was a contract on the part of Virginia which cannot be recalled; and in order to substantiate that ground they refer to the action of Congress, Virginia, and West Virginia, giving their consent to the admission of the latter State into the Union, which cannot be now withdrawn. We are told when that contract was entered into it could no more be annulled than any ordinary contract in reference to land.

The gentleman also refers, as evidence to show that Virginia had no right to withdraw her authority and consent, that when jurisdiction was granted over the District of Columbia, and the States sold dock-yards, grounds for forts, and United States buildings to the Federal Government, they might withdraw their consent as well as in this case. Sir, they could not withdraw their consent. Why? Because it only took two parties to make that contract, namely, the Congress of the United States and the States where the dock-yards, buildings, grounds, and forts were located; and when Congress entered into that agreement with the State it was final and irrevocable, and required the action of no other party in order to complete it. Therefore, those cases have no bearing whatever on the point here.

Now, how does the case stand? If old Virginia was a State de jure in 1863, when West Virginia was admitted into the Union, and the last act of the Legislature of Virginia giving her consent to the transfer in 1863 was valid, and she a State de jure, how could she have been a government de facto in only two years after, because when she gave her consent to this transfer the State of Virginia was almost solely—much more than at any other time—under the control of the confederate army. How could she have been a State de jure then, with the right to exercise sovereign power in conveying away a part of her own territory any more than she was in 1865, when she revoked her consent, and after the Union has been restored, when the war was at an end, when peace reigned, when her Legislature has been recognized, when the mails are carried through her territory, and when her Governor and her Representatives to Congress, elected by the people, have been recognized by the executive branch of the Government? If the argument is good that because the departments of this Government recognized the State of West Virginia, and of old Virginia in 1862 or 1863, is it not good now? Do not they recognize it? Does not the President of the United States recognize it? Do not all the officers in the Cabinet recognize it in the same way?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. I will not object to yielding if it does not come out of my time. I have no time to spare. Now, the committee admit the fact that West Virginia has not acquired these two counties through any consent of Congress, unless article four, section sixteen of her constitution, by which she was admitted into the Union, can be construed constructively to give such consent, which seems to be the idea contained in the report of the committee on page 2. Now, I have shown by the opinions of the court that it is necessary for Congress to give consent, and by the act of Congress that it did not give its consent to the incorporation of more than forty-eight counties into the State of West Virginia.

I propose to offer an amendment to the report of the committee. Although I believe that every exercise of jurisdiction over these counties on the part of West Virginia is null and void, all I ask is that this question shall be sent back to the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley, so that the people may vote upon it according to the laws of the country, whether they want to be admitted and incorporated into West Virginia or to remain with old Virginia. I propose this amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the question of the annexation of the said counties shall be referred to a vote of the people of each of them at an election to be held on the second Tuesday of April next, by commissioners appointed by the Governor of Virginia, and a majority of the legal voters of said counties under the laws of Virginia shall, at said election, be found in favor of such annexation.

But how am I met? I am now going to answer that argument. I am met by the argument of the learned gentleman who reported this bill, that we have no right to send this proposition back to these counties for their action. Why not? When West Virginia presented herself here under the agreement between herself and old Virginia to be admitted into the Union by act of Congress, she was refused admission and was sent back and told that when that State abolished slavery she could be admitted under the Constitution as a free State by act of Congress. And a new section was added to the constitution, and it was submitted to the people in March, 1863, and in April, 1863, the State was admitted upon the conditions prescribed by Congress, to wit, the abolition of slavery. But that constitution was never submitted to these counties. And it was not until January, 1863, that Virginia gave her consent to the transfer of these counties by a mere act of her Legislature. She was a State de jure then, to exercise one of the highest acts of sovereignty in the transfer of her domain. She was a State de jure a few months ago in repealing her act for transfer. Her de jure sovereignty as a State has since been acknowledged in her ratifying the constitutional amendment. If she was not a State de jure in 1863, when she gave her consent, her act was null and void, and the exercise of authority by West Virginia is usurpation on that account; but upon every view of the case, West Virginia usurped her powers in controlling these counties before Congress consented.

If Congress had a right to send back West Virginia for the purpose of having a vote there and a new constitution formed, so that the requirements of Congress might be complied with by West Virginia, will any gentleman who is a lawyer tell me that Congress has not the right under that same inherent power to order that an election shall be held in these counties to take the sense of the people whether they shall be added on to West Virginia or remain in the gallant State of old Virginia?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. If Congress now sends back the question to the people, by what means can Congress compel the people to take a vote upon this question?

Mr. ROGERS. By the same means by which Congress compelled West Virginia to take a vote on amending her constitution. An election may be held there in such manner as Congress may dictate under the laws of old Virginia. Congress has the right to send back this question to the people of these counties. The same thing was done in the case of Kansas. When the Territory of Kansas came here with a State constitution, because that constitution did not comply with certain conditions which Congress thought ought to be imposed, it was sent back to the people of the Territory, and they voted upon it before Congress would admit that Territory into the Union as a State. There is no doubt that anybody that has power to carry any act into effect has the inherent right to do everything that by necessary implication goes with it. I hold it a well-settled principle of law that old Virginia had no right to transfer part of her territory to another State unless her organic law gave her the right to do so. There was never any feature in the constitution of Virginia under which she could transfer her territory in this manner. This was a simple act of the Legislature of Virginia, held under the pressure of despotism and tyranny in time of civil commotion, and that Legislature had no right to transfer away a part of the territory of Virginia unless the organic law gave the Legislature the power to do it. And to prove my position, we see by the report of the committee that the State of West Virginia has put in a section in its organic law that new territory may be admitted by the Legislature. But suppose the organic law of West Virginia had made no provision for that, will gentlemen on the other side tell me that West Virginia would then have had the right to make any such compact, by virtue of a mere act of her Legislature, any more than the soldiers of Pennsylvania and New York would have had a right to vote in the field without a change of the constitutions of those States? That clause in the organic law can only be construed to mean that new territory may be added to the State, by the Legislature, with the consent of Congress.

But, sir, I call the attention of the radical party on the other side of the House to the fact that if the assent of Congress is given to the addition of these counties to West Virginia, you recognize both West Virginia and old Virginia as States, legally constituted States, States de jure, incorporated into this Union. I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the leader of the other side of the House, to show me the consistency of a vote upon his part for an act of Congress ratifying what the States of Virginia and West Virginia have done, when he claims that when the war was commenced the southern States became dead, lost their State existence, and became mere Territories.

And not only that, but the action of this House has decided that these counties did not constitute a part of West Virginia. I refer the House to the report made by the Committee of Elections in the case of McKenzie vs. Kitchen. All the members of that committee were men of intelligence and members of the Republican party, and most if not all lawyers.

That committee decided, without a dissenting voice, that Berkeley and Jefferson counties belonged to old Virginia, and that they were no part of the territory of West Virginia. The report says:

"But the claimant, McKenzie, by his notice of contest, contends that Berkeley county, where Kitchen received a large vote, and without which he would be in a small minority, was, on the day of election, no part of the seventh congressional district of Virginia, but was at that time a part of West Virginia, and consequently not entitled to vote for a Representative in this district."

That report was made on February 8, 1864, about two years ago. Let us see what it says further:

"Under the first of these acts of the State of Virginia, it does not appear that anything was done by the voters of Berkeley, Jefferson, and Frederick, to 'ratify and assent to the said constitution' of West Virginia, as provided in that act; and if not, of course the act had no effect in transferring the county of Berkeley to West Virginia."

That committee in their report admit that the constitution of West Virginia has not been submitted to the vote of the people of Berkeley and Jefferson counties. There was some clause in that constitution by which commissioners should set the time and places where the election should be held; but none was held. And the only election held in Jefferson and Berkeley counties was in two places, Harper's Ferry and Shepherdstown, which were both under the control of the military; and only about one hundred votes were cast out of a vote of twenty-five or twenty-six hundred votes. The committee say:

"If they did proceed to 'ratify and assent,' as therein required, still neither of these counties is embraced in the act of Congress admitting West Virginia, passed December 31, 1862."

The Committee of Elections make the same argument that I make now. When that argument was made by them, it was potential and powerful in this House; and when made by me, is it to be entitled to no consideration simply because I do not happen to agree with honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House? I submit that this is no political question, but a question of jurisdiction between States, which has yet to receive the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States. And let us deal with this question as we would with any other of like character. But I do not fear for the result. I have fear that the old, gallant State of Virginia, where the bones of Washington and Jefferson, and so many of the heroes of the Revolution repose, will be torn asunder by the action of this Congress, under the influence of party prejudice against that State.

The Committee of Elections proceed to say:

"But there is a further objection to this claim of Mr. McKenzie. The act of Congress admitting West Virginia into the Union enumerates the counties of the old State which shall compose the new one; and Berkeley is not one of them. Congress has never consented to the transfer of the county of Berkeley from the one State to the other; and without that consent it cannot be done. Berkeley county is therefore still a part of the old State of Virginia."

Are the action of Congress in refusing to admit either of the contestants into this House, the opinion of the very learned and legal gentlemen of the Committee of Elections, most emphatically deciding that Berkeley county belonged then to the old State of Virginia, to be regarded here as founded on the law and truth? And I ask the gentlemen on the other side if that report was true two years ago, is it not true to-day? Does not the same principle, which never dies or passes away unless the Government is subverted or overthrown, hold good yet?

And the committee go on to say that there were such military operations then being carried on there that they believe a fair election could not be held, and no fair election has been held there since that time, although the tramp of armies, the roar of artillery, and the sound of arms have passed away. I ask that we shall submit this question back again to the people of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, and let them say whether they want to constitute a part of the State of West Virginia or not.

Has Congress retroactive action? And is not this a retroactive law, an ex post facto law, one for the purpose of confirming acts upon the part of West Virginia, in exercising authority outside of her own dominions, which they admit they had no right to exercise, for they ask Congress to give their legislative sanction for their action, because West Virginia had no more right to exercise authority over these two counties than New Jersey had to exercise authority over those same counties.

Now, sir, I submit that there is no authority on the part of Congress to ratify this, that the three parties must consent altogether, and that until such consent be obtained, no act of this kind can be carried into effect, by reason of the well-established rule in reference to the construction of contracts; that if A, B, and C contract C constitutes an essential party to the contract as much as A and B, and without the concurrence of C in the contract it falls to the ground; and A and B may withdraw from it at any time before C has ratified it.

What is a contract? It is, according to the definition given by Blackstone, an agreement between two or more parties to do or not to do a particular thing. This is an agreement between parties to do a particular thing, and until the three parties have agreed to it, the contract is not consummated.

Now, sir, in the face of these grave doubts which are raised, will gentlemen object to allowing the people of these counties to say whether they desire that this transfer shall take place? If the theories of the gentlemen upon the other side are correct, West Virginia no more constitutes a State of the Union than the most remote Territory. It is, as I believe, a serious question whether West Virginia is a State; but I am not here to argue that question. I am willing to admit, purely for the sake of argument, that she is a State; but recognizing her as properly occupying the position of a State in the Union, the consent of the other contracting party to the transfer of any portion of her territory is necessary before Congress can carry it into effect.

Now, sir, here is the report of a committee of this House in the case of McKenzie vs. Kitchen; and this report takes the same ground that I now occupy, and makes the same argument. The gentlemen who made that report are gentlemen of talent and learning, and belong on the other side of the House, one of them the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.] All agreed to the proposition that these counties could not be transferred to West Virginia from old Virginia, on account of Congress not having consented, and being a necessary party to the agreement. We make the same argument that the committee do in reference to the reorganization of the confederate States, by quoting the acts of the different branches of the Government recognizing them as States. But when that question is in issue we are told that that argument amounts to nothing. But that case has no bearing upon this. The Constitution confers no power on Congress to reorganize States, and the acts of secession having been void from the beginning, all action based upon them is equally void. The President has expended his authority in protecting the people in the organization of their States, and they are now as much States as they ever were, as they never did or could commit suicide without the consent of the other States.

Now, sir, what difference does it make what the Executive Departments of the Government have done in reference to this transfer? They are not authorized to control our action on a question of this character. Neither the President of the United States nor any member of his Cabinet has the right to recognize certain territory as constituting part of a certain State, so as to preclude the action of Congress on the question, or legalize an illegal act. Why? Because this question stands on a different ground from the question of reconstruction, because Congress alone has authority to regulate this matter, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Hence, I say, I do not care what action the Executive Departments may have taken with reference to this question. I do not care what Secretary Chase, or Secretary Stanton, or President Johnson, or the late President, Mr. Lincoln, or any other person connected with the executive department of the Government, may have done in reference to this question. It is a matter depending rightly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the thirty-six States of this Union in Congress assembled. The consent of Congress is necessary before any such contract as this can be carried into legal effect. An act which is void ab initio cannot be rendered valid by retroactive legislation of one of the parties only.

We are all interested in this transfer. Pennsylvania is interested in it, New Jersey is interested in it, all the States are interested in it. If a Legislature in New Jersey should consent to the transfer of a large part of that State to the State of New York, and the people of the State of New Jersey should turn that Legislature out and put another Legislature in its place to recall that action, are we to be told that that cannot be done before the consent of Congress had been given to the transfer? I say that the people of a State have the power to annul any such act before it has been carried into effect. If they have not, then I say that power in this Government does not emanate from the people but from the representatives of the people, and Legislatures can dispose of the domain of States and prevent the repeal of the acts, before all the necessary parties have consented, and violate that plain rule of law, that a Legislature can pass no act that a subsequent one may not repeal.

According to the theory of gentlemen on the other side, the contract is complete, the agreement carried into effect, the grant executed and delivered, the property delivered into possession without the consent of Congress, and for that reason Virginia cannot withdraw her consent. According to that argument, if West Virginia has exercised sovereign control by virtue of a contract which cannot be revoked, then there is no necessity to have any act of Congress on the subject. If it is complete without Congress, then why come here and ask Congress to act on it? If West Virginia has control over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, I ask gentlemen what is the use of this proposition at all? How inconsistent you are, even on your own theory. You say that the contract is complete, that these counties have been recognized by all the departments of the Government, that West Virginia has instituted courts in those counties, and tried and hung men there, and that was all legal; yet you come here by the report of this committee and ask Congress to ratify all these things, as if they were illegal. But there is no such authority in West Virginia, she has no sovereign control over these counties. As I have shown by the decision of the court, she has no power until the consent of Congress has been obtained.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the remarks of my distinguished colleague on the Judiciary Committee, but he has failed to satisfy me that this resolution ought not to pass. It seemed to me that he has failed entirely to answer the arguments submitted in the report which I had the honor to make to this House on the 12th day of January last.

I believe, sir, that the State of Virginia assented to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia. It seems to be conceded that the State of West Virginia agreed to the transfer, and that all that was necessary to complete the transfer was the consent of Congress. It seems to be conceded that if the consent of these two States and that of Congress had been obtained the transfer would have been complete. The gentleman tells us that the State of Virginia withdrew her assent, and therefore this transfer is not now legal. I am free to say that the Legislature of Virginia, the so-called Legislature of Virginia, since this Congress commenced, did pass an act withdrawing her assent to the transfer of these two counties from old Virginia to West Virginia; but it seems to me that withdrawal can have no effect on this bill for three reasons:

First, West Virginia having accepted the transfer and the State of Virginia having assented to it, that assent cannot by any subsequent legislation be withdrawn. On the faith of her assent given by the Legislature of Virginia to this transfer, West Virginia took jurisdiction over these counties, organized her courts, and assumed complete jurisdiction; and that jurisdiction has been recognized by Virginia, accepted by West Virginia, and acknowledged by the authorities of the national Government.

There is another reason why Virginia could not withdraw her assent to the transfer of these two counties, and that is because Congress has already assented to the transfer. This resolution is not introduced because it is absolutely necessary, but simply for the purpose of settling a controverted question. When Congress admitted the State of West Virginia into the Union, with a clause in her Constitution authorizing her to receive the transfer of these two counties, that was itself a consent on the part of Congress; and no further consent was necessary on the part of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have the clause of the constitution read.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will read the clause in the constitution of West Virginia. The second section of the first article of the constitution, after naming the counties absolutely made part of the State, provides:

"And if a majority of the votes cast at the election or elections held as provided in the schedule hereof, in the district composed of the counties of Pendleton, Hardy, Hampshire, and Morgan, shall be in favor of the adoption of this Constitution, the said four counties shall also be included in and form part of the State of West Virginia; and if the same shall be so included, and a majority of the votes cast at the said election or elections in the district composed of the counties of Berkeley, Jefferson, and Frederick, shall be in favor of the adoption of this constitution, then the three last-named counties shall also be included in and form part of the State of West Virginia."

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have my friend answer this question: whether the district composed of Jefferson, Berkeley, and Frederick, is the district composed of Jefferson and Berkeley? It is the district composed of Jefferson and Berkeley which it is proposed to transfer to West Virginia, but there is another district known as Jefferson, Berkeley, and Frederick.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Oh, yes, the vote contemplated both of them. The vote was to be taken in the several counties.

Mr. DAWES. That is not the question I raised. It was, whether they consented that that particular district, composed of the several counties, should be transferred upon the vote of the several counties. Was it not that specific district, namely, the district composed of those three counties; and was that the same district which we propose now to transfer?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Two of the counties are.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand the assent to be that these three counties, or any two, or any one of them, are transferred, but three. I suppose it to be this: that they may assent to a particular district embracing three counties for very good reasons. I do not say that they are so, for I do not propose to object to this resolution particularly; but they may have very good reasons why two of these counties should not go unless the third one went with them.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will not controvert the gentleman on this subject, for I do not regard the question as at all material.

Mr. DAWES. While I am up I desire to put myself right on the record. Some gentlemen from these two counties sent to me (I do not know why, particularly) remonstrances against this measure, purporting to be signed by twelve hundred citizens of one of the counties and by six hundred of the other. I presented their petitions. I say I do not know why I was selected as the organ to present them, but I would inquire of the gentleman whether these parties had an opportunity to be heard before the committee?

Mr. LAWRENCE of Ohio. I will answer all that. The question which the gentleman makes is one of construction. That is, it is a question of the construction of this clause in the constitution of West Virginia, whether two of the three counties named in that district could become a part of West Virginia upon a vote taken in those two counties severally. Well, sir, I am not very particular as to what construction shall be put on that clause of the constitution of West Virginia, because if there be any difficulty about that clause, it is removed by other acts of the Legislatures of Virginia and of West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. What I want to find out is whether these eighteen hundred people, whose petitions I presented, as will be found by referring to the Congressional Globe, have had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. In answer to that, I have already stated, and the report to which I have already referred shows the fact, that laws were passed by the Legislature of Virginia, while that was a recognized State, giving the consent of the State to the transfer of those counties, and authorizing a vote of the people of those counties. And all these petitioners and remonstrants then had an opportunity to be heard when that question was voted upon by the people of those counties.

Mr. DAWES. What I wanted to know was this: some eighteen hundred men have selected me as their organ, every one of them an entire stranger to me, to present their remonstrance. Now, I wish to know if the committee gave them any opportunity to be heard, not whether they had some opportunity somewhere else.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will state that all these remonstrances were before the committee, besides a large number of petitions asking the consent of Congress to the transfer of these counties.

Mr. DAWES. I know that the remonstrances were there, because I sent them there. I only want to know if the men had any opportunity to be heard, whether you gave them any notice. That is all. Just put that on the record.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; we did not send out a constable with summonses saying to these men that we were in session and would be pleased to hear them. They never asked any permission to be heard, and we never notified them that we were in session; but we were always ready to hear all who desired to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if he is in the House, whether he did not receive a note from one of these men requesting an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The chairman is not here at present, or he could answer for himself. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts this question, whether those remonstrances are signed by men who were entitled to vote, whether they are not rebels who had no right to vote?

Mr. DAWES. I have already stated that every one of them is a stranger to me, and I know, of course, nothing about that. I suppose that a great deal the better way to ascertain that fact would have been to hear them. I would inquire of the gentleman one thing further: if the committee ever notified the member who presented these remonstrances that they were hearing this case, so that he could give notice to the parties?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. So far as I am advised, no member of this House, and no citizen of either of these States, and no man has ever asked permission of the committee to be heard, but after a full examination of this whole matter the committee made this report:

"The information in possession of the committee leaves no doubt on their minds as to what would now be the result of a vote for the restoration of these counties to the State of Virginia. The question is one which has since the close of the war entered largely into the local politics of these counties. The party which styles itself the 'Union party,' and is called by its opponents the 'radical party,' is unanimously in favor of retaining these counties in West Virginia; while the democratic, or, as it styles itself, the 'conservative party,' is generally in favor of restoring them to the State of Virginia.

At the annual election held on the fourth Thursday of October, A. D. 1865, the Union ticket received in Berkeley county nine hundred and twenty-three votes, and the so-called democratic one hundred and thirty-seven votes; and in the county of Jefferson, the vote as returned by the supervisors of the county to the governor was for the Union ticket three hundred and four votes, and for the so-called democratic ticket one hundred and ninety-nine votes."

This report was made, printed, and laid on our desks on the 12th of January, and yet no request has ever been made to be heard in opposition to it, or at any time on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see that that answers my question. I have no doubt that that is the conclusion that the committee came to without a hearing.

I wish the gentleman to understand that I am in favor of giving the assent of Congress to this measure. I am on the record in the last Congress to that effect. I suggested to the members from West Virginia in the last Congress the necessity of obtaining that assent. I am here now, without any solicitation of my own, the organ of eighteen hundred men in these counties, whether loyal men or not, as remonstrants against this measure. I thought it was due to them that the committee should state to the House whether they had had an opportunity to be heard. There is always a decent way of doing everything, and I have no doubt the committee in this case have adopted that way. I do not mean to say that they have not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has expired.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope my time will be extended a few minutes.

Mr. WEALEY. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman from Ohio. I merely wish to answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] as regards the petitioners from these counties, of whom he states that he is the organ. He asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] whether they had had the privilege to be heard before the committee. I only desire to say that they have another organ upon this floor, who has been heard to the fullest extent; I refer to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] That is all I desire to say, and I will now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I say again, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that, so far as I am advised, the committee has never denied any gentleman the privilege of being heard before them in opposition to this resolution. On the contrary, so far as I know, no application has ever been made to the committee for a hearing; none has ever been made by the gentleman himself; and the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] who opposes this resolution, was heard before the committee as he has been heard on this floor.

Mr. DAWES. I wish merely to state that I did not expect any invitation. It was not a matter that I desired to be heard upon. But I have been informed by these men, as a matter of complaint, that they addressed a note, on two different occasions, to the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] begging an opportunity to be heard; and that they had had neither any notice nor any reply to their note. I wished to draw that out; that is all.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. How that is I do not know. I never heard of any such note or any request to be heard.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman will understand my position, I hope.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir, I insist that the Legislature of Virginia, if it were a valid Legislature, could not now withdraw its assent to the transfer. It could not withdraw its assent to the transfer, because West Virginia has acted upon the faith of the transfer, upon the faith of the law giving the assent of the old State of Virginia to the transfer. That clause of the Constitution of the United States which requires the assent of Congress was not inserted for the benefit of the States concerned, but to enable the Congress to protect the interests of the United States. And therefore Virginia, old Virginia, has no right to claim any benefit from the fact that Congress had not given its assent to the transfer prior to the time when the so-called Legislature of the State of Virginia undertook to pass an act withdrawing her consent to the transfer. Virginia could make no such objection or resume her jurisdiction until Congress had refused assent to the transfer, or had for an unreasonable time delayed to assent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has addressed an inquiry during my temporary absence from my seat to the Committee on the Judiciary. If he will now propound his question I will answer it.

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that I did not make the inquiry in any spirit of complaint. But the parties who have made me their organ (why they selected me I cannot tell) have complained to me that they had not been allowed an opportunity to be heard before the committee, and I inquired of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] if the remonstrants had had an opportunity to be heard before the Committee on the Judiciary on this question. I did so that they might see in the report of our proceedings here an answer to my inquiry. The gentleman from Ohio replied that they had expressed no such desire to him. I then inquired if the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. WILSON] had received a note which they had addressed to him. I had understood from them that they had twice sent a note to him, but had received no reply.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In answer to that inquiry I will make this statement: after this subject had been passed upon by the committee, and the report had been submitted by my colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio,] to the committee, and had been agreed to by them. I received a note from a Mr. Pendleton, who resides in one of these counties, not asking to be heard before the committee, but stating generally his reasons for not desiring this action on the part of Congress. It was not such a letter that I deemed it called for an answer from me, but a mere general statement to me of his objections to this proposed action of Congress. No one that I can now recall to mind asked of me an opportunity to appear before the committee, either asking it in person or by letter. If any such letters have been written, they have failed to reach me.

Mr. DAWES. One of the gentlemen told me that he had written such a letter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I can only say that if any such letters have been written to the chairman of the committee, they have failed to reach him.

Mr. DAWES. That is sufficient for my purpose; I only wish to have it appear in the Globe that these letters were not received.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It may have been owing to the fact that that region of country is now in such a disturbed condition that the mails are irregular.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have been interrupted so often that I am scarcely able to follow the line of argument that I was pursuing, though I had not expected to discuss this subject at all; and only after I heard the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] did I intend to speak at all. But I hope I shall be able to present this matter so that it will be understood by the House.

I will again state, and briefly, the position which I take in this matter. The consent of the old State of Virginia was given for the transfer of these counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia, and that transfer was accepted by West Virginia. The consent of Virginia was given by an act of her Legislature, authorizing a vote of the people of those counties to be taken. That vote was taken, and it resulted in favor of the transfer. Now, I maintain that Virginia could not withdraw her consent after once having given it, and that especially she could not withdraw it by any act passed by her present so-called Legislature. And this is the third ground I proposed to assign. She could not withdraw it for the reason that once having given it, and the State of West Virginia having accepted the transfer, the old State of Virginia could not, as a matter of good faith, and as a matter of law, now withdraw her consent; for a grant by one State having been accepted and acted upon by another becomes irrevocable, unless Congress interpose to object to it. As between the States the grant is at once operative, since they have performed all the Constitution requires of them to perfect the transfer. Congress may object, but the States may not, and Congress has not objected, nor yet suffered an unreasonable time to elapse before acting on it.

Besides, she cannot withdraw her consent by the act which her so-called Legislature assumed to pass since the commencement of this session of Congress, for the reason that this Congress has refused to recognize the existing government of Virginia as a lawful government. Why, sir, at the commencement of this session we refused to admit gentlemen claiming seats as Representatives from that district of country now called the State of Virginia. We have uniformly refused to recognize the existence of any valid legislative body or of any existing State government in the State of Virginia. It is a matter of historical notoriety that her present Legislature is assembled in direct violation of her own constitution; that its members have failed to take the oath prescribed by her own laws; that the number of the members has been increased in utter violation and contempt of her own constitution; that the existing body called the Legislature of Virginia is not a legal body at all; and Virginia though having a State government de facto is without any valid or constitutional State government to-day. Therefore that Legislature could not by any act withdraw the assent of the State of Virginia, previously given by a legislative body which was recognized as a lawful body.

I have already, Mr. Speaker, attempted to demonstrate, by a reference to a clause of the constitution of West Virginia, that Congress has already assented to the transfer of these counties. My argument, it seems, was not quite satisfactory to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I will not repeat the argument on that subject, contained in the report of the Judiciary Committee, but I invite the attention of the House to that, as it embodies my views, and which I regard as conclusive.

But, sir, Congress has, by other means, given its assent to the transfer of these counties. And how? Why, sir, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] was pleased to read to this House an extract from a report made by the Committee of Elections, February 8, 1864, in the case of McKenzie vs. Kitchen. He evidently examined that report somewhat hastily, for he failed to read the following very material portion of it:

"It may not be improper to call attention to the fact that while the whole number of votes cast was two thousand and fifty-nine, only nine hundred and sixty-two of these were cast for Mr. Kitchen; and that of those seven hundred and thirty were cast in the county of Berkeley, where Mr. Kitchen now resides, a county which, on the same day that these votes were cast, voted also unanimously to attach itself to West Virginia, and which has, so far as the Legislature of both States can effect it, been made a part of the new State, and separated from this district altogether."

This vote was followed by a surrender of jurisdiction over these counties by Virginia and an assumption of jurisdiction complete and exclusive by West Virginia, continued uninterruptedly from that day to this.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has by other means recognized these counties as constituting a part of West Virginia. On this floor are her Representatives, one of whom comes here with a certificate declaring that he was elected in the district composed in part of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. He has been admitted to a seat here as a Representative from that district. That is a recognition by this House at least of the fact that these two counties constitute a part of the State of West Virginia.

Those counties are represented, too, in the Legislature of West Virginia, and they are not represented in the so-called Legislature of Virginia. That body now sitting at Richmond does not claim to exercise jurisdiction over these two counties.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will permit me to say that the Legislature of old Virginia does claim jurisdiction over those two counties, and they are both represented in that body.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have not so understood.

Mr. ROGERS. The new constitution of old Virginia was adopted in 1864, and these counties, along with the county of Frederick, were constituted a judicial district, and to each one of them were apportioned two delegates in the Legislature of Virginia. By an act of the Legislature, of 1864, they are made a part of the eighth congressional district; and each county is now represented in that Legislature by two members.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Can the gentleman from New Jersey tell me the names of those members?

Mr. ROGERS. I cannot.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Can he tell me when those members were elected?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir. They attempted to hold an election about a year ago, but Governor Peirpoint sent an army to prevent them. They have since held an election under the new constitution. They voted for the new constitution.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Then I am correct; neither of those counties are represented in that body sitting at Richmond, known as the Legislature. No elections have been held there.

So far from it, those counties have been recognized as part of West Virginia by the national Government, and a military force has been sent out by command of the President to prevent the authority of Virginia from having any control over them whatever.

Mr. Speaker, I have briefly answered the several grounds of objection which I understand have been taken by my colleague on the Judiciary Committee. I wish now to make a single remark in answer to what was said by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] He said, if I understood him correctly, that the new State government set up in Virginia under Governor Peirpoint, in 1861, derived its validity from the fact that it was admitted as a new State in the Union, and not because government was thereby guaranteed to an existing geographical State of the Union, and that West Virginia was admitted as a new State and derived no validity from the consent given to its erection by the Peirpoint new State government of Virginia.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know whether I made myself understood. I wanted to state the proposition that some of the members of Congress who voted to admit West Virginia excluded as far as they could the conclusion that they voted for it upon the ground that the State of Virginia had given its assent. I was of that number. We believed the State of Virginia had been overthrown; that the territory belonged to the United States; that the people on it owed allegiance to whatever government was administered by the United States; that these were in the Union while the constitution of Virginia had been overthrown; that therefore the territory which had been known as the State of Virginia was mere territory which the Congress of the United States was bound to provide with government as fast as the armies of the United States could bring it under the control of the Federal Government, and they consented to admit West Virginia as a new State into the Union, as they would admit a new State made out of the counties of old Virginia and the border States.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Even without the consent of Virginia?

Mr. KELLEY. There was nowhere any State of Virginia to consent; it had been overthrown.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Well, Mr. Speaker, although it is not material to the question before the House, I will briefly state my position on that subject. I maintain that the original lawful State government of old Virginia was overthrown by the rebellion, but that the geographical State of Virginia and the population of Virginia all remained in the Union. I maintain that it then became the duty of Congress to guaranty to the geographical State a government republican in form; that Congress did it; that when the Peirpoint government was first set up in Virginia it became the de jure government of Virginia, and was recognized as republican in form, and had then the capacity to consent to the erection of the new State of West Virginia; that it did consent to the erection of the new State of West Virginia, and there became then two States in the territory formerly of Virginia—the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia. I hold that since that time the government of old Virginia, which had been set up under Governor Peirpoint as a new State government, has ceased to be a de jure government, but the geographical State of Virginia as it exists after the erection of West Virginia still lives in the Union, and her people are in the Union; that they have simply a de facto government; that it is not a government de jure, and because it is not a government de jure this legislative body of Richmond had no authority by the passage of an act to withdraw consent which the prior de jure government of Virginia had given to the transfer of these two counties from old Virginia to West Virginia. That is my idea of the matter.

I have occupied more time than I ought to have done in answering my colleague on the committee. I have answered every objection which I have heard, except one which has been sent to me in a newspaper with a passage marked so that I might notice it. The heading of the paper is as follows:

"THE NEW ERA.

E. W. ANDREWS, EDITOR AND PUBLISHER.
Martinsburg, West Virginia."

It is under date of Thursday, January 25, 1866. In that paper is an article, which I understand has been circulated extensively among members of Congress, containing these words:

"But why is it that neither in this report nor elsewhere is it attempted to be shown that the Legislature of Virginia has any power to alien these counties?"

This article refers to the report I had the honor to make to this House on the 12th of January last, and presents the inquiry whether the Legislature of a State has the power to consent to transfer counties from that State to another State. I am a little surprised this question should be made, because in the case of Georgia vs. Florida, 17 Howard's Reports, 478, the Supreme Court held that the power of changing State boundaries with the consent of Congress is one of the essential attributes of the limited sovereignty of States, expressly recognized by the national Constitution.

A different rule of construction is applicable when you come to interpret the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of a State. The authorities on this subject are collected in a case in the twentieth volume of the Ohio Reports, which I do not now have before me. The Constitution of the United States creates a national Government with limited powers, enumerated powers, and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry them into effect. But the government of every State in this Union is of a different character. It is of that limited sovereignty which a State may have, and its government is not a government of enumerated powers, but it is a government having all the powers of legislation which are not denied to it, either by the Constitution of the United States or by the constitution of the State. Now, among the powers of sovereignty in every international State is the power to transfer territorial jurisdiction. This power is recognized by the laws of nations. It is a part of the treaty-making power of all nations. But in our system that sovereign power has been restrained, so far as the States of this Union are concerned, by the Constitution of the United States. They cannot, as an absolute sovereignty may, transfer territories and territorial jurisdiction by any treaty-making power; they cannot transfer it to any foreign Government; but as between themselves territories and territorial jurisdiction may be transferred by the consent of Congress. This power has been exercised by the States in ceding jurisdiction to the national Government for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and for the District of Columbia. It is a power not now to be doubted. As between Virginia and West Virginia, the territorial sovereignty over these two counties then has been transferred, and it only requires the assent of Congress to complete it. That is the very question now submitted to this House, to determine whether we shall give this assent.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me a portion of his time?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will yield to the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I deem it necessary to say a word. I mean to vote for this joint resolution as I voted for the admission of West Virginia. I mean to vote against the preamble, believing it all—not a lie, but not the truth—[laughter,] wholly inconsistent with the ideas which the majority of this House hold with regard to the State. When West Virginia came here to ask to be made a State it professed to come with the consent of old Virginia, and of new Virginia. The consent of old Virginia was given by a Legislature got up during the rebellion sitting in Wheeling, and the consent of new Virginia was got up in the same city of Wheeling, and they came here pretending that they had the consent of old Virginia, a hundred thousand people all along between here and the borders of West Virginia, and yet not a man could go down even at that time to Alexandria without being taken for a foe and carried to Richmond. That was the consent of old Virginia.

Now, sir, any man who supposed that under the Constitution that State was legally divided by the consent of old Virginia and the assent of new Virginia, was a—very kind man [laughter] and believed what he wanted to believe. He had faith, because, as somebody has said here, "Faith means to believe a thing because it is impossible." Now, then, I voted for the admission of West Virginia; but at the time I stated that I hoped, while I was going to vote for it, that no man would think me fool enough to do so on the ground that the provisions of the Constitution which applied to the dividing of the States had been carried into effect. But I voted for it not unconstitutionally; I voted for it in perfect accordance with the Constitution, admitting a new State out of conquered territory. [Laughter.] And I hold that doctrine yet.

Now, sir, this assent of old Virginia to these two counties being annexed to West Virginia was of the same kind. I am sorry my friend has found it necessary to put it upon any other ground. What was the condition of the Legislature of old Virginia in 1863? Why, sir, over here at Alexandria, a little beyond it, our lines existed. After West Virginia was declared a State, the Governor of old Virginia, who had been elected by the vote of a few counties over the border, took his saddle-bags and went down to Alexandria and said he was still Governor of what was left of old Virginia, and sat there and ordered a convention for the purpose of altering the Constitution of old Virginia. Eleven townships or thereabouts, some of them in that neighborhood and one about Fortress Monroe, where our troops were located, elected seventeen men, by about seventeen votes apiece, for one million and a quarter of the people of old Virginia. These seventeen men came and held a convention at Alexandria, made a constitution, and proclaimed its adoption in the market-house of that place. Before they got through I believe the rebel army came there and drove them off.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire if one of those seventeen was not the man that the gentleman voted to admit here as a Representative?

Mr. STEVENS. I never voted to admit anybody as a Representative but my friend did not ask me to vote for. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. My friend is laboring under a mistake.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I may be.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman voted to admit a man that the Committee of Elections reported against.

Mr. STEVENS. I doubt it. Well, I do not know; I have not looked at it.

Mr. DAWES. I refer to Joseph Segar. The committee reported against him; he came here with only twenty-five votes.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe I voted him in, and then voted him out. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Is the gentleman certain about that?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir, I am not. During those two years we made a most ragged record, as the gentleman well knows. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I was describing this convention. I say that that convention, consisting of seven members, made a constitution and ordered an election for Governor, at which Governor Peirpoint was elected by thirty-three hundred votes, two thirds of them Yankee soldiers, and he was declared in the market-house of Alexandria Governor of the one hundred and fifty counties of Virginia. Call that a State, do you? And it was a Legislature consisting of eleven men called under the action of that convention that gave their consent, that these counties should be annexed to West Virginia.

Mr. LATHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to correct an error of fact into which he has fallen?

Mr. STEVENS. With pleasure.

Mr. LATHAM. It was an act of the Legislature of Virginia at a time when the State of Virginia had jurisdiction over the whole of what is now West Virginia.

Mr. STEVENS. I am speaking of the last Legislature.

Mr. LATHAM. The last Legislature passed no such act.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not refer to the present Legislature. There was a Legislature consisting of eleven or twelve men before the present Legislature was elected. They sat at Alexandria.

Mr. LATHAM. This legislation took place before that.

Mr. STEVENS. Then there is not any consent at all. That other Legislature was dead and buried long ago.

Mr. LATHAM. All the legislation bearing on the question now before the House was passed by the Legislature of Virginia before the State of West Virginia was erected.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I do not know much about that, but I do know that it is said that Virginia has withdrawn her consent. Now, the present Legislature is certainly acting under the constitution that was made by these seventeen men at Alexandria. Well, after Lee's surrender, Governor Peirpoint took an omnibus—or I believe it was an ambulance—and took the records and all the officials, the whole government down to Richmond. [Laughter.] And then these eleven men constituting the new Legislature altered the constitution—the Legislature altered the constitution—and allowed other persons to be elected and rebels to come in, for Governor Peirpoint complained that unless they did that he could not find loyal men enough in the State to make up a Legislature. That is the government and that is the Legislature that has been withdrawing its consent! Sir, it is ridiculous. No man enjoys low comedy more than I do, but these low farces are too small to be acted on the theater of the nation; they ought to be spurned; there ought to be no sanction for them here.

I shall vote for the resolution just as it is reported, because I am willing to annex any part of our conquered province that was once Virginia to West Virginia, just as the Platte country was annexed to Missouri. I am willing to go further. I wish the State of West Virginia had taken her natural boundary, the crest of the Blue Ridge, so as to include the whole of the noble valley of the Shenandoah. I shall vote for the resolution upon the ground I have mentioned and none other, but I shall vote against the preamble, and I hope the House will vote it down, for it is not necessary and it is not quite true.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania cannot agree with me. I think, however, the difference between us is not a very material one in its practical results. I do not stand here to vindicate the government of Virginia since it has been transferred to Richmond. I am not here to assert that it is a legal government. But I do say that whatever government in a geographical State is recognized by Congress, is the government of that State, and it makes no difference whether it shall be composed of few counties or composed of many; whether it shall be able to exercise jurisdiction all over its geographical limits or over only a portion of them.

I maintain, then, that this State of West Virginia became a State by the joint action of Congress and the recognized State government in old Virginia; and that that recognized government in old Virginia (the government of Peirpoint, which was set up after the rebellion had driven out the original lawful State government) was a government lawfully set up under section four of article four of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry of him at this point?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Certainly. Mr. BLAINE. As there are several very able constitutional lawyers in this House, I desire to submit a query that seems pertinent to this discussion. Section three of article four in the Constitution reads thus:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any other State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

The section seems to be divided into three clauses, and my query is, whether the second does not, by fair grammatical construction, contain an absolute inhibition on "the erection of a State within the jurisdiction of another State." In this way bringing that semicolon into conflict with some precedents in our history. I shall cheerfully vote for the pending bill, and I should find no difficulty in justifying the vote, if it were needful, on the ground that West Virginia was the creature of revolution, as I think she was in her origin as a State.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I deny that the State of West Virginia is the creature of revolution; it is wholly the creature of law; that is, it is a State lawfully created in the forms required and authorized by the Constitution. It is too late for this Congress to say that under the clause of the Constitution which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has read a State may not be formed out of another State, for Kentucky was formed out of the State of Virginia.

Mr. BLAINE. Kentucky was ceded to the United States and afterward erected into a State.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. That is the same thing.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the case somewhat different, but I confess to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not think there is much in the point I have raised except a criticism on punctuation.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The Government of the United States has acted upon this question already, not only in the case of Kentucky, but by admitting West Virginia as a State. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that the construction for which he contends is not the proper grammatical construction to be given to it, nor is it the construction put upon it by the jurists of this country. The construction for which I contend is the one always recognized, acted on, and so completely established that it is constitutional law not now to be questioned or overturned.

The effect of that section three of article four, so far as this question is concerned, is precisely as though it read, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; and no State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State without the consent of the Legislature of the State concerned, as well as of the Congress." For this purpose it reads just as though the clause which I have omitted to read was not in the section at all.

And now, one word as to the duty of Congress, where the government of a State is overthrown. The whole duty and the whole power of Congress on that subject is contained in section four of article four of the Constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," &c.

That clause contemplates or recognizes two things; first, that the government of a State is one thing; and, second, that the State itself, for certain purposes, is another thing. In other words, there may be a geographical State, which is a thing different and distinct from the government of that State. When the lawful government of a State is subverted and destroyed, as it may be by rebellion, it then becomes the duty of the United States, of Congress, to guaranty to the geographical State a republican form of government. The duty is not to guaranty to a portion of the geographical State, but to the whole of the geographical State, a republican form of government. The duty is not to guaranty to the geographical State the same government which it had before, or to permit the people to resume the same government which they had before. But it is to guaranty a republican form of government; not the republican form of government which the State originally had.

It is to be any republican form of government which may be acceptable to Congress. And it was by virtue of that power that the Peirpoint government was established in the old State of Virginia, when by rebellion and treason the original lawful government of Virginia had been overthrown and abandoned. That is the position which I take; that is the view which I believe to be warranted by the clause of the Constitution which I have read. For when the geographical State has no government it has not a "republican form of government." The duty to guaranty government is, among other things, to provide the means of setting up a new State government when none exists. A guarantor is bound to do that which the principal ought to have done. The geographical State and the people never were and never can be out of the Union, but a State government may be abandoned or overturned, yet the nation cannot thus be destroyed. The national power may then be invoked to set up, to guaranty, new State government, and the power belongs to the nation, because it is essential to national life; for if left to the recreant States or the people thereof it might never be done by them.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a single remark somewhat personal to myself.

It has several times been said in the course of debate that I hold that the States that were engaged in the rebellion are dead. Now, I have never said anything of that kind. In my speech on this subject, I argued that, whether they are out of the Union, or dead, lying about in the Union, it amounts practically to the same thing. But I never pretended that those States are dead; I insist that they have never been dead, that they have always lived as States. The only difference in my position from that of some other gentlemen who have spoken is that I affirm that during the war they were States under the confederate government, and not under the Government of the Union.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I was about to call the previous question; but, as I have twelve minutes of my time remaining, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] with the understanding that he will call the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to remark that the preamble of this resolution is wholly unimportant, and I trust it will be voted down. I submit that the State of West Virginia is a State of the Union. I submit to the House that it is too late to challenge the power of the Congress of the United States to authorize the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of a State of this Union with the consent of the Legislature of such State; for it was done by the First Congress, composed in a great measure of the very men who framed the Constitution. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is mistaken in his statement that the territory of Kentucky was ceded to the United States. I affirm that the State of Kentucky was erected within the territory of the State of Virginia, by the consent of her Legislature, and by act of Congress admitted into the Union.

Mr. DAWES. I would remind the gentleman from Ohio that the same thing was done in the case of the State of Maine, which was formed out of a part of the territory of the State of Massachusetts, with the consent of the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir; and the State of Vermont was formed in the same way from part of the territory of the State of New York, with the consent of the Legislature of New York.

Having had the honor to take some humble part in the formation of the State of West Virginia, and her admission into the Union, I wish to say that in doing what I did, I but followed the example of the men who made the Constitution, and among them, of him whose peerless name is first attached to that great instrument.

Mr. Speaker, having said this much, I desire to repudiate once for all the statement of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that in the exercise of this power, I, as one of the majority of this House who admitted the State of West Virginia, did it as an act of sovereignty over a conquered territory and a conquered people. I deny that the armies of the Union have ever made one loyal citizen the enemy of my country or one root of the original Republic conquered territory by suppressing this unmatched and atrocious rebellion. The soil of the States that engaged in the rebellion remained through all the storm and darkness a part of my own, my native land in spite of the treason which was enacted upon it; and now that that treason has been subdued, it remains still a part and parcel of the native land of every natural-born citizen of the Republic. The loyal people of South Carolina, the loyal people of Virginia, are no more conquered subjects than is the venerable gentleman himself. They were all the while under the protecting shield of the Constitution. The armies of the Union struck to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to give effect to the laws, that the loyal might be protected and the disloyal crushed.

I deny ever having countenanced any such dogma as that the loyal people of West Virginia ever were conquered by our arms. The armed rebel was conquered. In accordance with the principle laid down by him who is sometimes called the Father of the Constitution, (Mr. Madison,) three hundred thousand of the loyal citizens of the State of Virginia, by reason of the rebellion and treason of the remaining seven hundred thousand of the citizens of that State, had the exclusive right of civil magistracy within the limits of the entire Commonwealth. No matter whether the loyal people of Virginia met in Richmond or Wheeling, in the persons of their chosen representatives; they asserted thereby their right, under the Constitution of the United States and in accordance with the statute law of the State of Virginia. When the majority of the State of Virginia turned traitors the minority of citizens therein who rejected the treason, being sufficiently numerous to constitute a State, had the right to assemble in any part of the State and exercise all the powers which pertained to them as citizens of the State, subject to the approval of Congress, but without question of the rebel majority. Why? Because in such loyal minority the entire sovereignty of the State abides, for the simple reason that the rebel majority in arms forfeited every right which belonged to them, whether as citizens of Virginia or citizens of the United States, by their treason. The traitor can never again exercise political rights in Virginia but by the will of the people of the United States.

I repudiate, as the gentleman does, this miserable contrivance here in Richmond called the Legislature of Virginia, for the simple reason that it has never been sustained and is not now sustained by a sufficient number of loyal men to constitute a State; but when a sufficient number of loyal citizens do petition in what is known as Virginia for recognition as a State, I say no man on this floor has a right to deny to them the right of local legislation, simply because, in the language of your Declaration, "the legislative powers of the people are incapable of annihilation" save by their own crime. Surely the traitor majority, by their great treason, cannot annihilate the right of the loyal people to local self-government.

That right sacred to the people of every State cannot be forfeited save by the act, the criminal act of the body of the community. So long as a sufficient number of the citizens of an insurgent State remain loyal to the Constitution to constitute a State, the Congress may and ought to recognize their right of self-government.

West Virginia is a State. She has consented to the annexation of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. The people of those counties have consented to it. It remains for Congress to consent to it. I care not for the consent of Virginia, because she has no organized State government. West Virginia is a State. Her admission by the act of Congress into the Union concludes every department of the Government, so long as she is faithful to the Constitution and laws of the Union. There is no department of the Government to-day which may lawfully dispute the rights of West Virginia as a State of the Union.

Sir, permit me to say that the Federal judicial officer who officially questions and denies the authority of West Virginia as a State of this Union, so long as the present action of Congress stands unrepealed by the sovereign power of the American people, simply subjects himself, in my opinion, to impeachment, and ought to be driven in contempt and disgrace from his office. For the annexation of these counties to West Virginia nobody's consent is needed except the consent of the people thereof and of the State of West Virginia; and that consent has been given.

It only remains, therefore, for the people of the United States to say whether the people in the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley shall be transferred to the jurisdiction of West Virginia. The preamble, as I remarked before, has nothing to do with the purpose of the bill, and I shall vote to strike it out. What remains is perfectly intelligible. Congress thereby consents and declares that the two counties shall be transferred to West Virginia. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

S. H. BOYD VERSUS JOHN R. KELSO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the matter of contest of S. H. Boyd vs. John R. Kelso; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

CLEMENT REEVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, information in regard to the seizure of the land of Clement Reeves, on the Delaware river; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison; when the Speaker signed the same.

TRANSFER OF COUNTIES—AGAIN.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ROGERS. I offered an amendment to the resolution, on which the question has not been taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gave notice that he had an amendment to offer, but he did not offer it.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask leave to offer it now.

The SPEAKER. It can only be received by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE, and LAWRENCE of Ohio, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-seven.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the passage of the joint resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 24, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Culom, Darling, Defrees, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eekley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Highby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Lathin, Latham, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McCruer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aornam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Wataley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, and Trimble—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Blow, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Denison, Eggleston, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McCullough, Melndoe, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Plants, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, William B. Washburn, Winfield, and Wright—46.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the title so as to read as follows: "Joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia." And on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill No. 201, to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes. It is important that this should be passed now, in order that the Department may prepare their blanks.

The SPEAKER. It will come up as unfinished business to-morrow before the morning hour.

The hour of half past four o'clock p. m., having arrived, the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. Cobb in the chair,) and resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the President's annual message.

HARBOR OF ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I feel obliged to interrupt the interesting debate that has been going on for some days to discuss an item of business that deeply concerns my district and State.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the importance, not to say necessity, of making a moderate appropriation to improve or rather repair the harbor of Erie. Although this harbor is situated some ninety miles west from the eastern terminus of Lake Erie, it is considerably nearer to the Atlantic ports at Philadelphia and Baltimore than any other harbor on the lake, and by the short route now opened through Pennsylvania and New Jersey, it is only about equally distant from New York. Many and expensive channels of communication with the country east and south of it have been opened by the capital and enterprise of our State; for this is Pennsylvania's only port upon the great chain of lakes. Both a canal and a railroad connect it with all the commerce of the Ohio river, with the iron and coal trade of Pittsburgh, and the peculiar manufactories of that city, and with the extensive fields of most excellent bituminous coal in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio. By continuous rail and unbroken gauge it is connected with the commerce of the world at Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, as well as with the vast mineral wealth of eastern and the lumber and rock oil of western Pennsylvania. In these channels of communication, the cities of Erie, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, as well as many counties and towns along the various lines, have made large investments in the hope that their respective localities might profit by as well as add to the immense traffic of our inland seas.

The harbor itself possesses extraordinary natural advantages. It is formed by a peninsula putting out from the shore in an arching direction, and bearing eastward and then southward until it dams off and landlocks a bay five miles in length and one fourth that distance in width. It is large enough to hold all the shipping on the lakes, and so well protected that the severest storms to which they are exposed do not in the least affect it. No engineering could have devised a better harbor. It would almost seem as if it had been arranged in the creation especially to throw into the markets of the world the vast mineral wealth hidden in the surrounding country. For near to and immediately in front of it are the great oil wells of Pennsylvania, whose steady flowing is shipped at Erie both east and west. Within a few hours' freighting distance, for we measure space by time now, stretching in a semicircle around this bay are beds of bituminous coal, exhaustless and almost as cheap as the waters of the lake. Much further to the east and across the Alleghany mountains, but higher and more accessible to this harbor than any other on the western waters, are the anthracite coal fields of our State—in quantity and quality, as everybody knows, unrivaled by the world. The Alleghany mountains are crossed on other routes, as for instance the Baltimore and Ohio and Pennsylvania Central, with terrific grades, but further north, on an air line between our harbor and this coal, the west branch of the Susquehanna has worn away the mountains and opened a channel through which the Philadelphia and Erie, but recently completed, passes almost on a dead level. It would seem as if God had lowered the crest of the mountains just in front of this harbor to allow this heavy but indispensable freight to pass upon gentle grades to the shipping of the lakes and the workshops and dwellings of the West.

So much for the value of the harbor. A word or two now as to the repairs needed. Many years ago a breakwater and two piers were constructed by the Government at the entrance of the harbor. The breakwater extends from the shore in the direction to meet the east end of the peninsula as it curves toward the mainland. Between this breakwater and the peninsula are the two piers, running at right angles to the breakwater, but parallel, of course, with the shore and each other. Between these two piers is the gate or entrance to the harbor. By a mistake, as is supposed, in the engineering, the outside pier is much the longest. It was supposed that this inequality in length of the piers would best protect the entrance against the formation of bars by the deposit of sand. The effect is just the reverse of the intention. The lake has its tides, as you may say, as well as the ocean, occasioned by the winds. The water rises in one part of the lake when the wind has been long in one direction, and falls when it changes. The swollen waters of the bay discharging between these piers creates at times a powerful current. This stream of water, after passing beyond the shore pier and finding no further obstruction on that side, while it is still crowded by the pier on the lake side, turns a short corner shoreward and passes off to the lake through short and irregular curves. Of course sandbars form on each side of this current over which vessels cannot pass. This narrow and crooked channel is difficult of navigation in fair weather and impassable in foul. We ask for an appropriation sufficient to extend these piers a little further into the lake, and make them of equal length, and also to dredge the channel impaired by the original error in their construction.

I do not ask this appropriation on behalf of the city of Erie alone, nor of my district contiguous to it, but rather in the name and on behalf of the great State within whose limits the harbor lies and by whose foresight and treasure the great works through which tide-water and lake commerce meet, and by which cheap transportation is furnished to that portion of her territory upon which the whole country is now in a measure dependent for iron, fuel, and light, were projected and built. My colleagues from the whole State will join me in asking Congress to give the assistance now so urgently needed and so long withheld.

On motion of Mr. COOK, (at forty minutes past seven o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. GEORGE W. BRIGGS, D. D., of Salem, Massachusetts.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Dayton, Ohio, and a petition of citizens of Ripley, Brown county, Ohio, praying for a reduction of the taxes imposed upon the sale of agricultural implements; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a memorial from a single citizen, but who is a representative man, an original anti-slavery man, and the editor of the leading religious paper of New England, protesting in the most earnest terms against the passage by the Senate of the constitutional amendment which has recently passed the House of Representatives. In his very brief petition he says:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no State shall grant any title of nobility,' and that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;' and

"Whereas that revered instrument contains now no clause that would disgrace"—

That is his language—

"that would disgrace a free nation or contradict the declaration that all men are born equal; and

"Whereas a resolution for amendment of the Constitution has passed the House of Representatives, which, in the opinion of the undersigned, would repeal these provisions and contradict this declaration, he respectfully prays you to reject said amendment."

As that question is still pending, I ask that this memorial lie on the table, and at the same time I take the liberty of saying that I subscribe absolutely to this memorial.

The memorial was laid upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I present also the petition of Mrs. M. J. Walker, of the county of Warren and State of Mississippi, in which she sets forth at some length a claim for damages on account of what was done by General Slocum when in command of our troops in her neighborhood. The petition is sworn to and is vouched for in several different ways. I ask its reference to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER also presented a petition of the Female Anti-Slavery Society of Philadelphia, praying Congress, by an amendment of the Constitution, to forbid any State to make any distinction in civil rights and privileges on account of race, color, or descent; and also similar petitions from the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, from citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, and from citizens of Connecticut; which were referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Connecticut, praying that no State recently in rebellion may be restored to the Union until adequate security has been obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against its being represented in Congress beyond its voting population, against any payment of debt incurred in rebellion, and against any distinction being made in its laws on account of color or descent, and praying for such an amendment of the Constitution as may be required to enforce the foregoing provisions; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of the executors of the late Colonel D. D. Tompkins, who was an assistant quartermaster general in the United States Army, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to audit and settle his accounts; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEWART presented a petition of postmasters in the county of Alpine, California, and Douglas county, Nevada, praying that Gelatt & Moore may be compensated for services rendered in carrying the United States mails in those counties; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NORTON presented three petitions of citizens of Minnesota, praying that the soldiers who enlisted in the early part of the war of the rebellion may be placed on an equal footing as regards bounty with those who enlisted at a later period; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have received and been requested to present to the Senate a memorial of the executive committee of the Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends for the Relief of Freedmen, praying for the extension of the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, and its continuance until its legitimate work is accomplished. As that subject has been acted upon, I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of New England, praying that in the passage of all bills establishing a new basis of representation there shall be no distinction on account of race, color, or sex; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Horatio Stone, praying for an appropriation to enable him to complete the statue of Hamilton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Library.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers connected with the claim of A. S. Robinson, arising under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo with Mexico, and the papers connected with the claim of J. W. Nye, for compensation for improving a lot of public ground, &c., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a petition of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who have been disabled in the United States service, praying for an increase of pension, reported a bill (S. No. 131) supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I will state that this bill increases the pensions of private soldiers and non-commissioned officers from eight to twelve dollars per month.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Robert B. Riell, a lieutenant in the United States Navy, praying that he may be promoted to the rank and place of commander in the Navy, from which, he alleges, he has been unjustly withheld, asked to be discharged from its further consideration: which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York praying for the passage of a law exempting suitors in the national courts of the southern States from the operation of State statutes of limitations for a period long enough to give loyal creditors an opportunity to enforce their claims, and a similar petition from the Boston Board of Trade, have instructed me to report them back with a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials, for the reason that further legislation, in the opinion of the committee, seems not to be necessary, as the act entitled "An act in relation to the limitation of actions in certain cases," approved June 11, 1864, seems to provide for the cases contemplated by the memorialists.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objections.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 98) to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to change the name of the ship Art Union to the name of George M. Barnard, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to prevent the kidnapping of freedmen and the revival of the slave trade on the southern coast of the United States, reported a bill (S. No. 132) to prevent and punish kidnapping; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 59) to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statutes of the United States, reported it without amendments.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia have instructed me to report adversely upon the petition of the officers and men of the steamer Union who were wrecked and taken prisoners while engaged in the expedition against Port Royal, off the coast of North Carolina, in 1861. The petitioners were prisoners from seven to eight months. While prisoners their families received one half the pay due them, and on their release the other half was paid, covering the whole time of their imprisonment. The petitioners pray for commutation of rations while prisoners, and compensation for clothing. All the clothing they had on board, except that on their persons, was lost. No fixed sum is asked for. The petitioners were never enlisted into the service of the United States, and do not come under the provisions of law for enlisted men. They were employes of the quartermaster's department, engaged at salaries and wages, and provisioned by agreement. The steamer was the property of the United States, and the petitioners may have been upon her in the service of her owners, having the compensation they afterward received from the quartermaster's department; or they may have been employed by agents of the department at given rates, or at rates prescribed by regulations. The rations were prescribed by regulations; but if a less amount was drawn than thus prescribed at any one time, no greater amount than that prescribed by regulation could be drawn at any other time. The engagement of the petitioners with the Government ceased when the ship was destroyed. The quartermaster's department having paid the petitioners during the period of their imprisonment, it is believed that it is some compensation for the loss of clothing.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 133) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLICATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing be directed to inquire what changes, if any, are necessary in the present laws providing for the publication of the laws of the United States.

REGISTERING OF VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up House bill No. 204, to regulate the registering of vessels; which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that no ship or vessel which has been recorded or registered as an American vessel, pursuant to law, and which has been licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag, and to have the protection of any foreign Government during the existence of the rebellion, shall be deemed or registered as an American vessel, or shall have the rights and privileges of American vessels, except under the provisions of an act of Congress authorizing such registry.

Mr. SHERMAN. When that bill was called up yesterday, it struck me that the policy of excluding from the American marine all the vessels that temporarily took shelter under a foreign flag during the war, and when the Government of the United States was unable to protect them from the depredations of privateers, was a bad one. It certainly is the object of the Government of the United States to have as large a mercantile marine as possible; and I do not think we ought to blame the ship-owners who temporarily sought shelter under a foreign flag when their vessels were liable to be captured at any moment by privateers built in England, but sailing under the confederate flag. The object of this bill, if I understand it, is to punish the owners of these vessels by a forfeiture of all their rights, and to prevent them from again enrolling themselves under the American flag and carrying on ordinary commerce under the protection of the American law. That is the purpose. It seems to me to be an unwise one. It is too severe a punishment for seeking temporarily the protection of a foreign flag. It will reduce the American marine I do not know how many tons; the Senator from Michigan no doubt can tell us; but I am told a pretty large number. Perhaps he will inform the Senate the number of vessels which sought shelter under foreign flags during the recent war.

It seems to me, however, as the war is now over, that there is no impropriety or no impropriety in allowing these vessels again to be what they were before, American vessels, with all the privileges granted by our laws to American vessels. The punishment that is now sought to be inflicted upon the owners of these vessels is entirely too severe for the crime or offense that they have committed. Indeed, when any one owning a vessel sailing under our flag found that, on account of reasons beyond his control and beyond the control of the Government, his vessel was liable to capture and seizure by a pirate on the seas, I do not see anything very wrong in his temporarily placing his ship under the protection of another flag for the purpose of carrying on commercial operations. He did not renounce his allegiance; he simply placed his vessel in a more favorable situation to carry on commercial operations. There is no doubt that many of the owners of these vessels who thus sought to protect their property temporarily under a foreign flag are among our most eminent and most skillful commercial men; men who have been patriotic, and who have poured out their wealth freely, and in many cases have sent their sons into the war; and I do not think that they ought to be very severely punished for what they have done in this respect during the war. It was not regarded as a very great offense at the time. The discrimination against American vessels by insurance companies amounted to several per cent, and in some cases American vessels were absolutely driven off of certain trade and these owners were compelled by events, over which they had no control, either to sell their vessels outright, or to seek temporarily the protection of another flag. To exclude all of these vessels now from the American marine would be simply to punish ourselves without accomplishing any great good. This is the view that I take of it. If the Committee on Commerce have examined the question thoroughly and can give us any light upon it, I should be very glad to hear it. I read the debate in the House of Representatives on this bill. It excited some attention there, and it seemed to me no reason was given sufficient to justify us in striking out of the list of American vessels all the vessels that temporarily sought shelter under a foreign flag during the recent war.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, by a law of 1793 all vessels that have been absolutely sold and sold under a foreign flag are now prohibited from obtaining an American register. The sole object of this addendum to the old law is to place all on the same footing; that is, to prevent those who have made a pretended and fraudulent sale from standing better before the law than those who have made a bona fide sale. Under that old law of 1793, no ship that had been transferred to a foreign flag can return under the protection of the American flag without a specific act of Congress. I do not think myself that this bill is necessary. I think that that law of 1793 covers the entire ground. I do not believe that the person who made a pretended sale can to-day get his ship back without an act of Congress. But this bill places the honest and the dishonest man upon an exact equality before the law; they must each of them have an act of Congress to bring their vessel back under the American flag, and it is for Congress to decide in each case whether it is for the interest of the Government to permit them to resume their nationality. I am informed by shipping merchants largely engaged in commerce, that the great majority, four fifths of all our shipping merchants have paid the extra ten per cent. insurance imposed upon them during the war, and that a large proportion of those who have pretended to transfer their ships without an absolute sale were disloyal men who desired to obtain an advantage over the loyal man who would not change his flag. The object is to protect those who have stood by their flag, to give those who have made a false sale no benefit over those who have made a bona fide sale, so as to place them all upon an equality before the law. I think the old law covers the ground completely, and yet in the estimation of the House there was a doubt, and they have passed this bill to prevent pretended transfers from having a preference over real bona fide transfers which were prohibited under the old law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire simply to say that it is known to every one that we were not able to afford protection to our commercial marine pending the recent troubles. They were compelled to seek the protection of other flags in order to carry on our own home commerce and transact the business of our own people. It became a necessity for them to sail under the flags of other nations. They were not safe upon the high seas under our flag, and they could not pay the immense insurance risks that it was necessary to pay if they were under American colors. There is no sound reason in policy or in justice why any extraordinary burden, such as requiring a special act of Congress, should be imposed upon that large merchant marine that was compelled to occupy that position. I hope the bill will not pass, and upon the passage of it, when the question upon its passage shall be before the Senate, I should like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to have this bill go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is to be no more debate upon it. I will make no reply to the Senator from California. I hope the yeas and nays will be given the Senator.

Mr. WILSON. If there is to be a vote taken upon it, I have no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. There will be a vote upon it. It is a clear case.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand this bill simply says that where a person has transferred a ship to a foreign flag during the pendency of the recent war, it shall not be recommissioned and reregistered as an American vessel until there shall be some action upon it by Congress in each particular case.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the whole of it. Mr. GRIMES. That is the law now in regard to each particular case, and it seems to me eminently proper this bill should pass. There are cases, perhaps, where the party owning the vessel ought to be permitted to reregister his vessel, but there are certain cases where they ought by no means to be permitted to reregister their vessels. The Senator from Ohio speaks of this bill as being a penalty that is to be inflicted upon ship-owners who have transferred their vessels to a neutral flag. We ought to impose a penalty upon them. If you do not, Mr. President, when you have another war, the first day that war is declared, all the shipping of the United States will be transferred to a neutral flag; and how are you going to reinforce your Navy? How are you going to secure vessels to keep up a blockade such as you kept up during the recent war? There ought to be a penalty imposed on these men who have shirked the payment of this ten per cent. insurance which the honest and patriotic ship-owners have paid, and who now, after having enjoyed all the advantages of foreign vessels in the carrying trade, and after having filled their pockets with British gold, come here and ask to be put upon precisely the same foundation with the loyal ship-owners who have been paying, during the last five years, this ten per cent. insurance. I am as much interested in what gentlemen from the West call their interests in the carrying trade as any other man can be, but it seems to me it is manifestly due to the shipping interests of the country, and to the patriotism of the country, that a bill of this kind should pass.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 81, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Tumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Stockton—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bucknow, Cowan, Crosswell, Howard, Nye, Wright, and Yates—7.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed without amendment the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) for the payment of the expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EMANCIPATION AND REBEL DEBT.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up Senate joint resolution No. 24, proposing an amendment to the Constitution, with a view to its reference.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. WILSON. Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. (two thirds of both Houses concurring.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. No payment shall ever be made by the United States, or any State, for or on account of the emancipation of any slave or slaves, or for or on account of any debt contracted or incurred in aid of rebellion against the national Government.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to refer this resolution to the committee on reconstruction; but before that motion is put, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments to explain the reason why I have introduced this resolution.

Mr. President, when the rebel chiefs raised the banners of revolution, four and a half million men, held as beasts of burden by constitutions and laws, usages and customs in fifteen States, were valued by their possessors at more than two thousand million dollars. These thousands of millions of capital invested in human sinews, hedged about and guarded by constitutional provisions, legislative enactments, judicial decisions, the quick instincts of personal interest, the jealousy of class and the pride of consummated power, then controlled institutions and States, and directed public councils. In the pride of assured possession the holders of these millions of beings, made in the image of the common Father of all the races and kindred of men, and of these vast material interests, then placed all upon the hazard of civil war. That civil war closed in utter defeat and overwhelming disaster to those dominating possessors of human chattels. These four and a half million slaves are things no longer, but men evermore. This capital invested in the bodies of our fellow-men was wrested from the gripe of its possessors by the hand of the war invoked to make slavery and the mighty interests pertaining to it a perpetual inheritance.

When the rebel slave-masters saw their vaunted confederacy crumbling and falling around them, they, true to human nature, indulged the delusive hope that some gradual system of emancipation would be inaugurated, or that some compensation for their lost millions would be made by the Government they had striven to destroy. While they were indulging in these illusions the President required them to amend their State constitutions, and to adopt the amendment to the Constitution of the United States for the utter extinction of slavery. Coming to the realization of their defeat, disaster, and humiliation, they yielded a reluctant consent to these requirements of the President of the United States. Though interest dictated a prudent reserve, utterances in Georgia, Louisiana, and other States give warning to the nation that the rebel slave-masters hope for compensation for slaves emancipated by national authority. Georgia adopts the constitutional amendment with the distinct avowal that it will not preclude her from seeking compensation for her emancipated bondmen, and political conventions in Louisiana emphatically declare their purpose to seek such compensation. Manifestations in many forms in other sections of the South give unmistakable indications that they are biding their time, when within these Chambers they will clamor for compensation for slaves wrenched from their possession by Federal power. Prudential considerations now impose silence upon them; but the "natural leaders" of the South know full well that, when these vacant chairs are again filled by the representatives of reorganized rebel States, the demand for compensation for slaves emancipated by our decrees will fire the southern heart and rally and unite the southern people, as the echoes of the opening cannon on Sumter fired, rallied, and united them in the spring of 1861. Who is there among us that does not believe that these reconstructed but unrepentant rebels will seek the first, the last, and every occasion to wring from the nation some compensation for the millions emancipated by the fiat of the national Government? That statesman is indeed little read in the school of human nature who believes the people of the rebel States will not seek by all the means at their command to extort from the Federal Government some consideration for the lost millions invested in four million men, made free without their consent and against their will by the authority of the nation.

To these $2,000,000,000 lost to them by enforced emancipation is to be added the confederate debt, amounting to thousands of millions more. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] told us the other day that the South had lost by the rebellion $10,000,000,000. Impoverished by these immense losses, surrounded by the wastes of war, by the maimed soldiers of the rebel armies, and the widows and orphan children of men fallen in battle, the rebel leaders cannot, will not, dare not cease to demand some compensation, and to labor for some compensation, by every means within their power, or to war upon the national debt, which takes from the people of the rebellious States a portion of what the losses and waste of a four years' war left to them. He who expects other action than this from the leaders of southern opinion is but a poor student of human nature, and especially of slaveholding human nature.

To maintain the unity of the Republic, and preserve the menaced life of the nation, the Government of the United States summoned more than two million men to the field, organized vast armies, created naval squadrons for the blockading of southern ports, and carried on for more than four years a war of gigantic proportions. To support those vast armies, to create these great naval squadrons that hovered along the southern coast from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, the Government was compelled to call upon the loyal people for nearly three thousand million dollars. That people, animated with the same lofty and self-sacrificing patriotism that carried their sons to battle-fields, at this call of their country loaned these millions to feed, to clothe, to arm, to pay the soldiers of the Republic, and to pension the widows and orphan children of heroes fallen in battle for the existence of the Republic. With the same holy zeal that filled the ranks of our war-wasted battalions, that contributed seventy-five millions in charities to the sick and wounded defenders of their country, the loyal people—bankers, merchants, farmers, mechanics, laborers, all conditions of men, and women, too—in the dark and trying days of the rebellion, when men of little faith doubted the result of the struggle for national existence, and rebel sympathizers and rebel apologists prophesied disaster and national bankruptcy, trusted their interests and fortunes to the faith of their endangered country. These millions of the loyal people, loaned upon the plighted faith of the periled nation, created the armies and navies that lined the coasts, and swept the fields of rebellion till the slave-masters' confederacy crumbled into dishonored fragments. This national debt, created by the Government for the preservation of the national life, is as sacred as the blood of our heroes poured out on battle-fields. This national debt is the price of national existence. Faith, honor, interest, all alike demand that it shall be guarded as we guard and cherish the scarred heroes and the widows and orphans of the nation's dead.

This vast national debt, larger, if measured by interest, by the annual cost of carrying it, than the debt of England, will bear not lightly upon the resources of the nation. To fund it at reasonable rates, to provide the means promptly to meet the interest upon it, and to extinguish it at no distant period, to make the burdens bear as equally and lightly as possible upon all interests, will tax the resources of statesmanship, and the patience, endurance, and patriotism of the people for years to come. Not only are the holders of these national securities concerned in whatever affects the public credit, but all conditions of men and all the pursuits of life are also concerned in whatever affects it. The national debt has been made the basis of our banking system and currency. Money-lenders and money-borrowers, merchants, manufacturers, business men of all occupations, depositors in savings institutions, and the laborers who carry home to wives and children the fruits of daily toil, all now have a direct, a personal interest in maintaining unimpaired the faith of the nation and the credit of its securities.

The holders of the public securities, the people, concerned in all their vital interests in maintaining the credit of the nation, in funding the public debt at low rates of interest, and providing for its ultimate extinguishment, and in the return at an early day to specie payments, now demand, and they have a right imperatively to demand, that the national securities, in which are blended all public and private interests, shall not be put at hazard by experimental legislation. National credit, like individual credit, is ever sensitive. It feels the approach of danger, be it ever so stealthy in its advances. The holders of the public securities cannot but anxiously note multitudinous indications of coming danger. With the clear vision of self-interest, they see, feel, realize that the guardianship of these thousands of millions of dollars, incurred to put down the rebellion, cannot be safely intrusted to the defeated rebels. The holders of the public securities, the possessors of the currency founded upon the public faith, the scarred soldiers of the Republic, and the heirs of fallen heroes, are hardly ready to intrust their inheritance, be that inheritance ever so small, to the men who have lost two thousand millions' invested in the sinews of a race emancipated by the national authority, and the holders of thousands of millions of confederate bonds and obligations. They know that these baffled and ruined men, smarting under defeat, poverty, and wounded pride, will be ready ever to make combinations with those who in the dark and troubled night of the rebellion predicted the scaling down or the repudiation of the national debt, to secure payment for rebel debts and emancipated slaves, or to scale down or repudiate the debt incurred for their overthrow. The holders of your securities, the people whose vital interests require that these securities shall be guarded against possible danger, imperatively demand that irreversible guarantees shall be made that the nation will never assume rebel debts nor pay for slaves emancipated by the needs or will of their endangered country.

The loyal people of the United States who risked their private interests in support of the national authority have a right to demand—it is their highest duty to demand—that the Government shall require, as a condition precedent to the admission of rebel States, that the fundamental law shall be so amended as to make it forever impossible that the public debt shall ever be endangered by the payment of a single dollar for emancipated slaves or confederate obligations. Let these words, or words to the same effect, be incorporated into the Constitution of the United States:

No payment shall ever be made by the United States or any State for or on account of the emancipation of any slave or slaves, or for or on account of any debt contracted or incurred in aid of rebellion against the national Government.

Let the confederate States be required, as a condition precedent to their admission into these Chambers, to adopt it. Its incorporation into the organic law of the land will hedge about the national debt with additional guarantees and securities, and make safer every interest of the country and the people.

Five years ago the leaders and organizers of the rebellion, without one grievance to be redressed, one wrong to be righted, one right to be vindicated, left these Chambers, turned their backs upon country, duty, and honor, and sought, through the fire and blood of civil war, the dismemberment of the Republic and the death of the nation. Three hundred thousand loyal heroes, in the bloom of life, have died that the nation might live. Hundreds of thousands more, scarred and maimed, or bowed by wasting disease, linger among us, and a national debt of vast proportions burdens the industries of the future. These are the legacies treason leaves to the nation. Now, these people that five years ago called home their representatives, these men who made vacant these chairs, again seek admission to these Halls. Surely it is the right and the bounden duty of far-seeing statesmanship to demand and take reasonable security for the future of the country. Ere the representatives of rebellious States come back, a loyal people may require new guarantees for the safety of the country, saved by their money and their blood.

It is, to my poor comprehension, time lost to discuss the mooted problem whether the States lately in rebellion are or are not in the Union. The discussions of the schoolmen in the Middle Ages were hardly less fruitful of practical results. One thing is clear to the practical sense of the country; the people of the rebel States are as subject, individually and collectively, to the power, will, and authority of the nation as are the people of New England, of the central States, or of the West. Those insurrectionary States declared they would go out of the Union; the nation said they should not. They fought four years to get out of the Union; the nation fought four years to keep them in. They were defeated and their power annihilated. Not a flag of their waves, not a bayonet of their's glitters in the sunlight. The flag of united America floats over their strongholds, over city and hamlet, and the tramp of her conquering legions rings in the ear of a subjugated people. Courts and custom-houses and post offices are open, judicial officers and the collectors of foreign and internal revenues are there, and the authority and power of the national Government are as complete there now as on the day South Carolina led the dance of secession. The protection of the nation for person and property in the rebel States is now more potent than at any other period for the past generation; for all the purposes of governmental authority over the people of those States the Union is entire and complete.

True, the practical relations of the States to the Union are not completely reestablished. The Senators and Representatives from the rebellious States are not yet here to participate in our legislation and to frame laws for the country they have striven to blot from the map of nations. They cannot yet lay their hands upon the statute-book of the country, nor aid in shaping the future of the regenerated Republic. When they are to come is for the Congress of the United States to determine. Ere they shall come, we owe it to the country, to the interests of its loyal millions, to see that such conditions are imposed as justice and liberty, the enduring interests of the whole nation, and the public safety, require. We may not require of the returning representatives of rebellious States, as conditions of admission, that they shall always vote for taxes to pay the annual interest of the debt their treason imposed on their country, or for the extinguishment of that debt at no distant period; nor may we require of them that they shall vote to pay the pensions pledged to our scarred veterans, or to the widows and orphans of our slain heroes; but we can require, and we should require, as a condition precedent to their admission, the complete repudiation of all rebel debts, and the entire abandonment forever of all claims for an emancipated race. The people of the loyal States, if Congress shall give them the opportunity, will surely incorporate into the fundamental law of the land these words, or words of like import:

No payment shall ever be made by the United States, or any State, for or on account of the emancipation of any slave or slaves, or for or on account of any debt contracted or incurred in aid of the rebellion against the national Government.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object to this resolution, but I think the Senator from Massachusetts cannot but be reminded of what passed between him and myself when the bill to pay for slaves emancipated in the District of Columbia was before the Senate. I thought then it was a most injurious and wicked precedent for this Government to acknowledge by a payment that there could be any such thing as property in man. The Senator from Massachusetts then insisted that it was a sort of peace-offering that we ought to give to the slaveholders here. The other Senator from Massachusetts thought it was a ransom. But I have come to the conclusion that I was right then, and I believe I am now, that we ought from the beginning never to have paid a dollar in any form for property held in that regard. I believed that if we once established the precedent for it, it would be a dangerous precedent, and one which we had reason to believe would be followed. The effort of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to get $15,000,000 in payment for the slaves emancipated in his State failed, to be sure, but it did not fail for lack of the votes of the Senators from Massachusetts. They both voted for it. It failed on other accounts. I am very glad, indeed, that this resolution has been introduced; but we ought to have taken the ground in the beginning never to pay a dollar for the emancipation of slaves, and then we should never have had a precedent.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose if all of us could have seen the end from the beginning we never should have offered Missouri any compensation for emancipation soon to come, nor should we have offered it to the people of the District of Columbia. We did not see the end from the beginning, and like practical men, putting liberty and the great cause above a few dollars, we commenced in this District by paying these people. I never regretted it. I do not think any harm will ever come of it. We have put down this rebellion at the cost of more than three hundred thousand lives and three thousand million dollars of national debt, and nobody knows how much of State and individual indebtedness has grown out of it. We have wrenched these slaves from their masters by power. It is more than we can expect of human nature that these men should never clamor for some consideration, and I think we have a right to take, and ought to take, security for the future.

Mr. POMEROY. That is what I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer this resolution to the joint committee of fifteen.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I only desire at this time to move that the amendments of the House be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 201) to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 204) to regulate the registering of vessels:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David

G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 6th August, 1864; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 201) to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the State of West Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Chair will call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] upon which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the very kind permission of the Senator from Maine, before he commences his argument, which I suppose will go to the whole question and be, as everything that comes from him is, able and exhaustive, I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment, so that the proposition that I had the honor to submit some days ago and had referred to the committee on reconstruction may at the same time be considered in the lengthy arguments of Senators upon the various propositions that may be submitted for the amendment of the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary then read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "that" in the amendment, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

The following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE 14. No State, in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein shall discriminate against any person on account of color or race.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I think I might raise a question, if I were so disposed, upon the propriety of the amendment submitted by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I am not aware that a bill can properly be offered as an amendment to a proposition to amend the Constitution. It is substituting one thing for another of a very different nature; and I do not see very well how, upon the same principle, the amendment of my honorable friend from Missouri can be offered as a substitute for the bill that is presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not propose, however, to raise any question upon either, for it really makes no difference in this discussion. I take it, it is very possible that the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, needs some correction. If so, Senators have had ample time to examine it, and they will be prepared, undoubtedly, to suggest what may be necessary in order to do what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has said is the proper office of an amendment, improve the proposition which I have submitted on the part of the committee. I should be very glad to see it made stronger. If the complaint against it is that it is weak, I hope Senators will turn all their attention to the question of strengthening it, so that when it shall come to be finally adopted, if it ever is, it may meet the approbation of the country, and accomplish the work for which it is designed.

Before proceeding to consider it, allow me to say a word upon a petition that has been presented this morning by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, accompanied by the remark that he approved every word of it. I did not attend to its reading. I very seldom attend to the reading of petitions. I have taken pains to look it over since, and am a little surprised that he should have told the Senate, with due deference to the action of one branch of Congress on this subject, that he approved all that was said in this petition. Allow me to read it, sir. I think that the Senator accompanied it with the remark that it was from "a representative man." I do not know what is meant by "a representative man," or what the man who signs this petition—

Mr. SUMNER. I said he was the editor of the leading religious paper of New England.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, then I know who he is. His name, it appears, is Isaac Farwell Holton; I dare say a very respectable and a very pious man. His petition is in these words:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that 'no State shall grant any title of nobility,' and that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of the several States;' and whereas that revered instrument contains now no clause that would disgrace a free nation or contradict the declaration that all men are born equal; and whereas a resolution for amendment of the Constitution has passed the House of Representatives, which, in the opinion of the undersigned, would repeal these provisions and contradict this declaration, he respectfully prays you to reject said amendment."

The inference is that the passage of this resolution would disgrace a free nation and contradict the declaration that all men are born equal, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts gives to that statement the sanction of his high authority. Sir, if I thought the passage of this resolution would disgrace this nation, I should not stand up here, even by the direction of a committee, to present it and to recommend it to the consideration of the Senate. If I thought it would repeal the declaration that all men are created equal and entitled to the same rights under the law, so far as that declaration exists, I trust I should be long—as long as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—in standing here before the body of which I am a member and advocating its passage. Sir, it is something of an imputation even coming from the mouth of the Senator from Massachusetts to say that more than two thirds of the House of Representatives, and those his friends socially, and politically, and in every sense, and his constituents, have been guilty of fabricating and passing a resolution which is a disgrace to the country, and which repeals the cardinal principle upon which our institutions are founded. I think that the honorable Senator, when he gave the sanction of his high authority to declarations like these, had hardly well considered whether or not it was modest so to designate the action of many men who, though less eminent than himself, have each some claim upon the consideration of his country.

Now, sir, as I do not agree with this petition, I shall venture to do what becomes my duty as a member of the committee on reconstruction so-called, and that is to endeavor to present, not my own views entirely, but the views which actuated the committee in recommending this joint resolution which has been laid upon your table. The resolution under consideration, it will be noticed, is not the original one that I presented. After discussion in the House of Representatives, it was recommended to the committee, and was amended there by striking out the words, "and direct taxes." This was done for two reasons. In the first place, it was thought that it would be stronger without a provision having reference to direct taxes, upon which a question might be raised. In the next place, if the words "and direct taxes" were stricken out of the resolution, the result is precisely the same, because the direct taxes are by the Constitution levied and apportioned upon precisely the same principle. Therefore it was entirely unnecessary to have the words in, and, in fact, the only argument in favor of it was that the two might go together in the same paragraph; but inasmuch as some objected to them, it was thought well enough to omit them. I have stated this preliminarily.

I wish to say another thing by way of introduction. It has been objected, I think, by an honorable gentleman in the other House, that the committee in reporting this resolution had traveled beyond its powers; that it was a question not submitted to them. I beg leave to say, lest any Senator who hears me should have the same impression, that a resolution substantially similar to this one was referred by the House of Representatives to the committee that had these subjects under consideration, and being sent to them for their consideration, of course they had the best right in the world to report upon it, and to report it in the shape in which it was originally sent, or in any other shape in which they chose to put it. I think, therefore, that the committee of fifteen is not open to animadversion as having exceeded its powers or taken upon itself anything that did not properly belong to it.

Something has been said, also, on different occasions, with reference to a disposition that is said to prevail now to amend the Constitution, and the forbearance of Congress has been invoked with regard to that venerable and great instrument. I believe that I have as much veneration for the Constitution as most men, and I believe that I have as high an opinion of its wisdom; but, sir, I probably have no better opinion of it than those who made it, and it did not seem to them, as we learn from its very provisions, that it was so perfect that no amendment whatever could be made that would be, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, an improvement. Why, sir, they provided themselves, as we all know, in the original instrument, for its amendment. They, in the very earliest days of our history, amended it themselves. They found defects in this great work of their hands, and they set themselves regularly to work to see if there was in the instrument, which ought to be perfect, and is as perfect, perhaps, as human hands can make anything, anything which might disfigure it, or which needed strengthening, or perhaps more elaboration. That was their opinion as proved by their acts; and I might add, that it is barely possible, if gentlemen will consider, that in the progress of ages, in the advance of time, circumstances may arise that will render it necessary, and have rendered it necessary, to revise the instrument and to accommodate its powers to the developments which time has made.

Such is eminently the condition of things now. We have had a great war. That war has resulted in overthrowing an institution of the States, one that had been a blight and a curse upon this nation from its very foundation. The contest in which we have been engaged has put an end to that institution. There are provisions in the Constitution having express reference to the existence of slavery, more especially the provision under consideration, that with reference to representation, which was made expressly because in some of the States there were a large number of people not recognized as freemen but held as bondmen, and not responsible for their own acts, that is to say, politically, or considered with reference to the political condition of the country. Under these circumstances, slavery being done away with, the provision of the Constitution which was made with reference to it becomes in a degree inoperative and may well be subject to revision.

It may be answered that the Constitution, in this particular, takes care of itself; that there is no difficulty about it; that the original provision that representation shall be founded upon population—including all persons, with one exception, and with regard to those three fifths—will take care of itself when they become free, because, of necessity, when they become free persons, the provision with regard to representation has reference to all, and it is a simple matter that now there are no classes of persons in the country who come within the description which was hinted at by the Constitution; all stand alike upon the same basis, and representation is properly founded upon population. This is all very well; there is no doubt of the correctness of the proposition so far as the construction of the Constitution is concerned; but, sir, it so happens that we cannot put out of sight one thing which has gone with us from the foundation of the Government and has come down to the present day, and that is, that slavery has existed; that it has been abolished within one or two months, substantially, since the declaration of the final action of the States; that there are left in several of the States of the Union a large number of persons ignorant and uneducated, who up to a very recent period have been held in bondage, considered by the Constitution itself as entirely unfit to be counted as a part of the people of the United States and represented as a whole; and that now, at the present moment, not only have they been made free, but they have been made free against the will of the remainder of the population of those States; to which must be added, the anger of those who have been compelled to submit to their freedom, the natural desire that the master has to retain power, the natural disinclination that he has to see his former slave placed upon a level with himself. All this is perfectly obvious, for we know—the history of the world shows—that those who once possess power never yield it willingly. Men are not made of such stuff that they can give up the possession of that which has been dear to them without a sigh and without a struggle. What then have we a right to suppose would be the result of leaving the constitutional provision where it is? Simply this, that so far as the power exists in the States, it would still be exercised to deny all political rights to those who have heretofore been considered unfit and not in a condition to exercise them. The result of that is what? The continuance of precisely the same rule, and the fostering of a feeling which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has well proven to be contrary to the very foundation principles of a republican government. There can be no question that such would be the result; and we should have in a portion of the States all the people represented and all the people acting, and in another portion of the States all the people represented and but a portion of the people only exercising political rights and retaining them in their own hands. Such has been the case, and such, judging of human nature as it is, we have a right to suppose will continue to be the case.

Then the question arises whether it is not our duty to guard in some way against this, whether it is not the duty of Congress, if it can exercise it, and the duty of the people, to see not only that all men, all free men, have the rights that belong to them so far as we can contrive it, but that the temptation shall be removed to keep up a system which, if it does not end in tyranny or an oligarchy, or an aristocracy, has a tendency to make an oligarchy and an aristocracy in fact, and a feeling which as long as it exists and there is power to exercise it has a tendency only to injure the institutions of the State where it may exist and where the exercise of it may be found.

There is a simple way of doing this. I expected that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who does not like this amendment, would have proposed it. Why not propose a simple amendment precisely in the same terms the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENRISON] has—a proposition doing away at once with all distinctions on account of race or color in all the States of this Union so far as regards civil and political rights, privileges, and immunities? That would go to the root of the matter. I am free to confess that, could I legislate upon that subject, although I can see difficulties that would arise from it, yet trusting to time to soften them, and being desirous, if I can, to put into the Constitution a principle that commends itself to the consideration of every enlightened mind at once, I would prefer something of that sort, a distinct proposition that all provisions in the constitution or laws of any State making any distinction in civil or political rights, or privileges, or immunities whatever, should be held unconstitutional, inoperative, and void, or words to that effect. I would like that much better; and I take it there are not many Senators within the sound of my voice who would not very much prefer it; but, after all, the committee did not recommend a provision of that description, and I stand here as the organ of the committee, approving what they have done, and not disposed to urge my own peculiar views, if I have any, against theirs, or to rely exclusively on my own judgment so far as to denounce what honorable and true men, of better judgments than myself, have thought best to recommend, and in which I unite and agree with them.

An objection that might be made to that, a real objection, would be its immediate operation. It would place the States which have recently been slave States in this condition, that they must either limit the suffrage too far or they must extend it too far for their own safety, or, at any rate, for what might be presumed to be their own good. I take it no one contends, I think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts himself, who is the great champion of universal suffrage, would hardly contend, that now at this time the whole mass of the population of the recent slave States is fit to be admitted to the exercise of the right of suffrage. I presume no man who looks at the question dispassionately and calmly could contend that the great mass of those who were recently slaves, (undoubtedly there may be exceptions,) and who have been kept in ignorance all their lives, oppressed, more or less forbidden to acquire information, are fit at this day to exercise the right of suffrage, or could be trusted to do it, unless under such good advice as those better able might be prepared to give them. If we passed a resolution of that kind, what would be the result? The result would be that the slave States, so called, must either admit all or else they must make a rule of exclusion which would cut off not only all or nearly all the colored population, but a very large portion of their own white population from the exercise of the right of suffrage, for it has been a characteristic of those States that they have been almost as unwilling to extend the benefits of education to the whites as to the blacks, and the result which I spoke of would follow: power would pass into the hands of the few, comparatively very few. The whole civil and political power of the State would be exercised by a very small number, and for a time, at least, it would be what the dictionaries define to be an oligarchy, the power of a few. I speak of this not as an argument that would prevent my putting into the Constitution a provision, not perhaps in terms, but in substance, like that which is offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, if I could accomplish it. Of course I would trust to time, and it would have its effect. With that great principle lying at the bottom, after awhile the result would be attained, and we should have in the Constitution itself what I would like to see there, a glorious exhibition of what does, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proved to us, lie at the very foundation of republican government.

But, however this might be, (and I do not propose to enlarge upon it, I only propose to state the difficulties,) I am not convinced that suffrage is such a very natural right that it must necessarily be conferred upon every free man. I think no Senator will contend for that. In a republican Government it may be that it may receive the name of a right, although most people call it a privilege; but a voter is an officer, not in the same degree, perhaps, but as much so in substance as the man who enters the jury box, as any one who holds an office. It is a trust imposed upon him by the law, which he executes under the law; and although I hold that the exercise of the right of suffrage should be extended just as fast and as far as the public good will allow, I do not hold that any man is injured when a just and reasonable law provides that something more is necessary to him than a bare existence as a free man in a community in order to exercise it.

While the honorable Senator from Massachusetts argued, and argued with great force, that every man should have that right, and that he should only be subject to disabilities which he could overcome, his argument, connected with the other principle that he laid down and the application of it that he made, that taxation and representation should go together, would just as well apply to women as to men; but I noticed that the honorable Senator dodged that part of the proposition very carefully. While he says that minors and insane persons and divers others, and perhaps those who were not well educated, might very properly be excluded, yet when it came to the question whether females should vote or not, I did not hear that he expressed any opinion upon that subject whatever; and yet his argument goes to that extent. If a necessary connection between taxation and representation applies to the individuals in a State, and that is his application of it—an application which our ancestors never made of it; they applied it to communities, not to individuals—I should like to have him tell me why every female that is taxed ought not to vote.

Sir, all this question with regard to the right is one after all, in my judgment, to be wisely considered by every State. You cannot settle it upon any minute principle, because the conditions of the States vary. In one State one rule may be beneficial, in another another. The only question is whether the law is just, and whether in the rules that are made in regard to it there is nothing that is at war with the great principle which lies at the foundation of our Government, that all men are and ought to be equal. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that a caste exclusion is entirely contrary to the spirit of our Government, or of any republican form of government.

But, sir, it was not my intention to discuss that question; I come back to that which I stated: what are the objections to putting into the Constitution at once a provision doing away with all distinctions of this kind? I have given one answer which does not satisfy myself. But the argument that addressed itself to the committee was, what can we accomplish? What can pass? If we report a provision of this kind is there the slightest probability that it will be adopted by the States and become a part of the Constitution of the United States? It is perfectly evident that there could be no hope of that description. The argument with regard to Connecticut was not that the action proved aright, but I might appeal to the vote which was taken in one of our own New England States rejecting a proposition which proposed to do away with all distinctions between men on account of color; I might go to Wisconsin and appeal to my honorable friend who insists so strongly on having thirty-six stars, [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and ask him what probability there would be of its adoption in Wisconsin or in any of the western States, where the difficulty exists now. We must take men as we find them. Why, sir, if we proposed an amendment of this description, and if we passed it in Congress, of which probably there would be no sort of chance in the world, how long should we have to look to the States before it could become a part of the Constitution? I think it would go in Maine, because we are very liberal there, and particularly well educated. [Laughter.] I cannot answer for any other State, not even New Hampshire, for I believe New Hampshire will not allow Catholics to hold office; and if that is so it looks very much to me as if possibly they might reject such an amendment; but I think it would go in New Hampshire. But how is it in New York? New York makes the distinction to-day and insists upon it. Of course we should have all the States where slavery has existed against us. If that is so, if it would be a mere idle proposition, one that would not commend itself to anybody, not in the first place to Congress itself, and in the second place not to the States themselves, should we be acting like practical and sensible men to throw everything else aside and put this question upon that alone? Whatever I might think of it, the committee thought otherwise, and that proposition therefore is not before the Senate.

Laying, then, that out of the question, there are but two propositions to be considered: one is whether you will base representation on voters, either voters generally or citizens who are voters; and the other is the proposition which is before the Senate. I suppose that the proposition to base representation upon actual voters would commend itself to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I believe I have in my desk a proposition he made to amend the Constitution, that was laid before the Senate so early in the session that the bell which called us together had hardly struck its last note before it was laid upon the table, in which he proposed that the representation of the United States should be based upon voters. Let me ask him if that does not leave in the hands of the States the same power that exists there now and has existed heretofore. What is the difference in fact? The slave States, unless prevented in some other way, might just provide that no person who is of a certain color or a certain race shall vote; and then it would have precisely the same effect that this proposition has in substance. How does the Senator find this so objectionable and that so suitable to accomplish the purposes which he desires to accomplish? The proposition came from him; of course it met his approval; of course he would desire to make it a part of the Constitution of the United States. What was the object? The object was precisely the same that we have here; and that is to limit the representation according to the extent of the suffrage, and in that way to hold out an inducement to the States to extend their classes of voters as far as possible in order to increase their political power. Was there anything else in it than that? If there was nothing else in it than that, is not this the same proposition so far as that particular point goes? The power exists now and will continue to exist unless it can be taken away by a statute, and of that I shall speak by and by.

The power exists now at the present time in all these States to make just such class or caste distinctions as they please. The Constitution does not limit them; the Constitution in terms gives us no power; it leaves to the States, as everybody knows, the perfect authority to regulate this matter of suffrage to suit themselves. What was the object of the honorable Senator when he offered that amendment? Was it not to limit that—not by law, but by simply holding out an inducement to the States which were recently slave States to extend the suffrage to the colored race and to all races for the sake of the political power which it would give? And yet in the beginning of his speech he talked of this proposition as another compromise with slavery. If this was a compromise so was that, for it did not profess to move an inch toward accomplishing the purposes which he and all others have so much at heart.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that at the same moment that I introduced that proposition of amendment I introduced a bill, which was by act of Congress to declare that all men were equal before the law, and that there could be no denial of rights, civil or political. The two measures were to go together.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not for me to judge the honorable Senator's logic. I am unaware how far two measures so entirely distinct can go together, one an amendment to the Constitution to endure for all time, and which lies at the bottom as a foundation principle, the other an act of Congress that may be repealed tomorrow, and which provides no sanction, no penalty, no measure, no machinery, nothing but a reenactment of the Constitution itself in language not half so forcible. I know that the honorable Senator would gladly make it as strong as possible. But I was appealing to him to answer me, not that I ask him to answer now, but in the ordinary form of address to answer me why and how he can denounce one measure in the strongest possible terms as a compromise, as showing a want of moral principle, as an abandonment of moral principle, while he himself offers another which is founded upon the same idea, and can only accomplish the same results.

Mr. SUMNER. I take issue with the Senator precisely on that point of the argument, and at the proper time shall answer him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests an inquiry, how does the Senator know but that this proposition will be followed by legislation? How does he know what has been the consultation of the committee or what the committee propose to do? The question is, how far is it good, and no further. Now, sir, I am not speaking of the words, but I am speaking of the effect of the two upon the question under consideration. The effect of limiting it to voters is simply to leave the power where it is, and leave it perfectly in the power of the States to regulate suffrage as they please. The proposition submitted by the committee goes that whole length. It leaves the power where it is; but it tells them most distinctly, if you exercise that power wrongfully, such and such consequences will follow. How far that shall be an argument I will speak of by and by.

What objection is there to basing representation upon voters? And here again I beg leave to state the views of the committee on that subject. There are several objections. In the first place, we naturally become attached to that to which we are accustomed especially if it is well founded in principle, and agreeable to us in all ordinary respects. The principle of the Constitution, with regard to representation, is that it shall be founded on population; that the people who are voters, males of twenty-one years of age, (as has been the ordinary construction,) are not the whole people of a State; and when a State has representation, the representatives, whoever they may be, do not consider themselves as representing males over twenty-one years of age alone, but as representing all, those under age as well as those over age, females as well as males. I do not know how the honorable Senator from Massachusetts feels, but I could hardly stand here easily if I did not suppose I was representing the ladies of my State. [Laughter.] I know, or I fancy I know, that I have received considerable support from some of them, not exactly in the way of voting, but in influencing voters. [Laughter.]

As I have said, we are attached to that idea, that the whole population is represented; that although all do not vote, yet all are heard. That is the idea of the Constitution. But another objection to basing representation upon voters is that it would be unequal. I have not taken the trouble to search the tables and see how far that inequality would go, what State it would operate in favor of and what State it would operate against; but we all know very well that it must necessarily operate most in favor of the new States, and the never the State the stronger would be the operation, because the newer the State is the greater is its proportion of males over twenty-one years of age and legal voters. We, of the old States, are not of opinion that the new States, made up as they are in the beginning, are any better able to conduct the affairs of Government than we are ourselves. We are willing to concede to them equality, but not superiority. It would, therefore, as I have said, and as has been argued—because this matter has been thoroughly discussed in the other House, and is perfectly familiar to everybody—produce an inequality, and a very considerable and striking one, so far as some of the States are concerned.

But again, it would hold out an inducement to run the ballot to an unreasonable extent. A State being possessed of political power, naturally desiring more, might look around to see how it could make itself equal with another State, and thus might extend its franchise; and the other might see that it is likely to be overbalanced, and extend its franchise in the same way, and perhaps the result might be an unseemly race between States to increase their political power by increasing the number of their voters. Therefore, if you propose to do anything of that sort, you must limit yourselves, make your provision, and say how far it shall go.

It would operate badly, the committee thought, in some other particulars. Take, for instance, the State of Missouri. I understand that in that State rebels have been disfranchised, substantially; they are not allowed to vote. That may be a necessary and wise policy there. I am certain it would be wise to do it in a number of other States. Will you cut off from these States the power to do so? No, you do not cut off the power; but do you wish to hold out an inducement to them to repeal their law or to change their constitutions, if it is a constitutional provision, and allow rebels to vote, because you punish them with the loss of political power unless they do so? I do not know but that it would lead to a repeal of the test oath and certain registry laws and a great many things of that description, which are very beneficial safeguards with regard to the elective franchise anywhere and everywhere.

These in general were the objections which the committee had to basing this amendment of the Constitution, or this limitation, or whatever you may call it, upon voters; and if you extend it to citizens, or narrow it to citizens, you make it worse so far as many of the States are concerned; for my honorable friends from the Pacific coast, where there is a large number of foreigners, would hardly be willing to have them cut off; and they have no benefit of political power in the legislation of the country arising from the number of those foreigners who make a portion of their population. The difficulty is that you meet with troubles of this kind everywhere the moment you depart from the principle of basing representation upon population and population alone. You meet with inequalities, with difficulties, with troubles, either in one section of the country or the other, and you are inevitably thrown back upon the original principle of the Constitution. That is the idea of the committee. How far the committee is right about it, and how far the views which I have submitted, and which presented themselves to them, may be considered as after all of very small account in the consideration of a question so important. It is for the Senate to judge.

Then, sir, when we get beyond that, there is only one proposition left, and that is the proposition which the committee has adopted and recommended to Congress.

I will read it:

ARTICLE — Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

It will be noticed that the amendment which we have thus presented has one good quality: it preserves the original basis of representation; it leaves that matter precisely where the Constitution placed it in the first instance; it makes no changes in that respect: it violates no prejudice; it violates no feeling. Every State is represented according to its population with this distinction: that if a State says that it has a portion, a class, which is not fit to be represented—and it is for the State to decide—it shall not be represented; that is all. It has another good point: it is equal in its operation: all persons in every State are to be counted: nobody is to be rejected. With the very trifling exception fixed by the original Constitution, all racess, colors, nations, languages, and denominations form the basis.

But, sir, the great excellence of it—and I think it is an excellence—is, that it accomplishes indirectly what we may not have the power to accomplish directly. If we cannot put into the Constitution, owing to existing prejudices and existing institutions, an entire exclusion of all class distinctions, the next question is, can we accomplish that work in any other way?

I am one of those who have always thought it was better to govern men by their own convictions of their own interests than by force. Even if we had the power to pass the other resolution, I am by no means certain that all the good we expect from it would follow, although it meets my wishes and my views. But here we are; the Constitution as it stands says that all persons shall be counted in order to form a basis of representation. We propose to alter that, and we propose to alter it in order to avoid a great evil and accomplish a great good. In attempting to make that alteration, we naturally inquire as to our power, what can we do? The opinion is that what I have specified cannot be done. The thing cannot be done in that way. The question then is, can it be done in any way, and if in any way, if any amendment to the Constitution would be acceptable to the people which has a tendency to accomplish the great result that we aim at, and is not in itself otherwise objectionable, why not take that? As I look at it we ought to be practical.

I do not think it my duty as a legislator in this Hall to trouble myself much about what are called abstractions. My constituents did not send me here to philosophize. They sent me here to act, to find out, if I could, what is best for the good of the whole, and to do it, and they are not so short-sighted as to resolve that if they cannot do what they would, therefore they will do nothing. Then let us look and see if this proposition which we have advanced to you has not a tendency to produce the great result that we wish to accomplish. I speak to our friends, not to those who are opposed to all efforts of this kind. I speak to those who are willing to do something.

Sir, it says to these people, to all people mind you, that all men should be equal; it says to all the people of the United States, "You shall be represented in Congress, but as we fear that you may be governed by narrow views, as we fear that you will do injustice to a portion of the people under your charge, and that you will not carry out the great principles which lie at the foundation of the Constitution itself, and of all free and republican government, as was so eloquently shown by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, we say to you that you shall not have political power any farther than you show by your action that you are disposed to let all under your charge participate in it." Is not that a great principle? Is it not worth something by way of inducement? Is it a "mean compromise," for so it was denominated—that the committee of fifteen and the House of Representatives when they passed it placed themselves in the situation of Pontius Pilate, with the negro for the Saviour of the world and the people of the United States for Barabbas, as designated by the honorable Senator. Why, sir, I expected to hear him in the next breath go further than that and say that what with the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the States the negro had been crucified, and that now by the amendment to the Constitution the stone had been rolled away from the door of his sepulcher, and he had ascended to sit on the throne of the Almighty and judge the world! One would have been permitted to say with all respect, in as good taste as the other:

Now, sir, we propose this, and what does it lead to? Men love political power: they do not part with it easily; they love to increase it. Having a little, they are ready to grasp more. If this is the case, have we not done something if this amendment is passed, to say to men, "Your political power shall be in exact proportion to your action in the right direction?" We say it not to one people alone, but to all. It cannot be pretended that this is applied to one State and not to another State. What would be the natural consequence? I have faith in the good sense of men. Those who were slaves are now free. It is naturally a sore subject to those who once owned them. In time that soreness and rawness will be healed and worn away, and men will begin to look about them and ask themselves, "Is it an object for us now to keep so large a portion of our population ignorant, stupid, unfit to vote, and at the same time take out of our own hands and deprive ourselves of the power they would give us in the Union of the United States? Shall we not rather make of this population a useful population? Shall we not rather educate it? Shall we not rather increase our own political power, raise ourselves to a level with those States which have the same population with ourselves?" Is it not natural to suppose that that would be the ordinary result, not immediately, but in the course of time? If it would be, the resolution has something to recommend it; it commends itself to me, not being all I would ask for, but much that could be gained, and if I can get no more I am most happy to take that, unless, indeed, it is attended with the effects suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. If I believed his view to be correct I would vote against the proposition.

What are the two points that he makes? because having considered the advantages of the proposition, it remains to consider the objections. One of them is the objection stated in the petition which I have read this morning, substantially that it takes away the power from Congress to legislate upon the subject, which power it has now.

Mr. SUMNER. A present renunciation of the power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. How is it a renunciation of power? If that was his exact language, I misapprehended it.

Mr. SUMNER. That was my language.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well. How is it a renunciation of the power? We may pass a bill to-day, the Senator's bill, if he chooses, on the back of it and the strength of it. The power exists in the Constitution, the Senator argues, to legislate on the subject. He says that under the guarantee clause, and the clause which gives to Congress the power to carry into effect the powers granted and existing in the Constitution, we may legislate to-day and pass laws by which the suffrage will be given universally. That I understand is his idea. By presenting this proposition to the States, do we renounce that power? Can we renounce that power? How? Will the Senator tell me? In what way can Congress renounce a power that is given them by the Constitution? They may omit to exercise it; but there can be no renunciation. If it exists in the Constitution it stays there until changed; and not all the powers of all the Congresses that have existed since the Constitution was adopted can take away one jot or one tittle of it, however much they may neglect their duty. It is saying what? It is speaking the truth. Pass your law basing representation upon voters alone, and the power is there, if it exists at all, to do as any State pleases with regard to this question of representation. It may make the voters few or many. This resolution simply says, you have the power perhaps, but if you have it, and if you exercise it in the way that we fear you may, or that it is possible you may, these consequences follow. We put it in plain terms, leaving it to each State to do what it pleases.

Sir, I would like better—indeed I drew a resolution to that effect and should like to have it passed—to append to this very resolution another resolution amending the Constitution and giving power to Congress to legislate upon the subject in full. The Senator would not agree with me, because he says that power exists now. Let us examine that question for a moment. I do not know but that the power does exist; my inclinations are all that way. I wish the power did exist, if it does not. But, sir, how did our ancestors, the fathers who made the Constitution, look upon this question of guarantee? Everybody will see—the Senator has certainly often contended and will not deny—that a constitution or a form of government which recognizes slavery is not a republican form of government, according to his definition, the American definition; and yet in the very instrument in which the fathers provided that the United States should guaranty to every State a republican form of government they recognized the existence of slavery unmistakably, and provided for it in the very clause that we have been considering with reference to representation. Did they then consider that the obligation to guaranty a republican form of government extended thus far, giving Congress the right to interfere in Virginia to examine her constitution? I ask the question that he may answer it, because after all he will admit, as a lawyer, as we all must, that in construing a constitution and construing a statute and construing any provision, we look at contemporaneous history in the first place, and we look more particularly when endeavoring to find out what the sense of an instrument is, at all its clauses, in order to get the meaning of all, for one explains the other. It would seem to me, then, that the Senator went a little too far with his argument as to the guarantee clause. What is understood by a guaranty? In the bill that he has presented, and upon which I desire to say a word by and by, he speaks of a guaranty as we speak of it at common law in the ordinary legal sense of the term. Is that all it means in the Constitution?

I may guaranty to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts the possession of his house, and I may propose to execute my guaranty, but he may say to me, "Sir, you need not trouble yourself about that; I release you; I do not wish to be put in possession of my house." I do not know of any right I have to say, "You shall be put in possession of your house, and I will put you into it whether or no." I think the common law acceptance of the term "guarantee," or the exposition of it, would hardly apply.

"Guarantee," as used in the Constitution, means something more. It means that every State shall have a republican form of government. It is a power granted for the benefit, not only of the particular State in question, whichever it may be, but of all the States. Whether you call it a compact or what not, it is a provision to secure by the power of the United States a republican form of government to every State that shall be a member of the Union. There is no doubt about that. But does it go further, and say that the United States shall have power to examine every statute passed by every State which has a republican form of government to begin with, and see whether it conforms to it, and if it does not, to order its marshals and its courts to interfere and set it right, and if the court is resisted, to turn out the military and raise an army in order to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, and see that its laws are all in accordance with it? Sir, it goes not beyond matters very substantial; it hardly goes into details like these.

If that is the meaning of the guarantee, and that is the way it is to be carried out, I take it the people of the United States may have enough on their hands. What army would answer the purpose? What extent of power would be necessary if this State and that State, which perhaps may have a provision that is in its nature somewhat wanting in republican essence, is to be brought by force of the United States through all its legislation and in all its legislation into exact accordance with the ideas of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, or my ideas, or anybody's ideas? I take it that the term "guarantee," as used in the Constitution did not intend to go quite as far as this; at least it so strikes me. I wish I could believe with the Senator on this point; but when he argues that under this provision of the Constitution it is the duty of Congress to examine the legislation of all the States, and see that every man votes who ought to vote, and nothing is wrong, and that his idea, or our idea, for it is the correct idea, of a republican Government is carried out in all its details, I think he goes considerably further than those who made the Constitution ever intended to go. I think the President has the idea that if any State should undertake to establish a different form of Government, if it should choose to have a monarchy, or the controlling portion of the people should choose to have an oligarchy, it then becomes the duty of Congress to interfere; if there is any outrageous violation of the principles which lie at the foundation of our Government, then it is their duty to interfere; but I hardly think that it goes so far as to give Congress the power to legislate upon every subject upon which it might think the States should happen to be wrong.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator could not have been in his seat while I treated of that part of the question, for he has not stated at all my proposition. My proposition was identical with that of the President. It was in case of a lapse of a State government, and when it became the duty of Congress to interfere with reference to that government, it must see that it was republican in form. I expressly limited the application of the argument to such a case, and the Senator will bear in mind that the preamble of the joint resolution introduced by me goes on that theory. I have made no suggestion that under the guarantee clause we could revise the statutes of the States generally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, sir, the gentleman says I misapprehended him.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator was not in his seat and could not have heard me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was not my intention to misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood him, when he argued that we were bound to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, and that Congress had power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry out the several provisions of the Constitution, to hold, that for that reason Congress could legislate to see that no State whatever passed laws or attempted to execute laws which deprived freemen of their natural inalienable rights. If I misunderstood him, I stand corrected. I did not hear all the Senator said, but I heard the greater part of it and listened to it very attentively.

But let us take it on his own showing. The Senator says we may secure it in the States which have lapsed. That is a new phrase, but perhaps it is as good as any other. How does he propose to do it? By passing an act of Congress. Suppose we get them in. They have lapsed, but we avoid the lapse and take them back again, with an act of Congress providing that everybody shall have his rights under the Constitution. What is to prevent a repeal of the act of Congress after they get here; and if it be repealed what becomes of the guarantee? The Senator tells us that this proposition of his is proposed—mind you, is proposed—as a substitute for the constitutional amendment which is proposed by the committee. Now, what is there in it? But of that I shall speak by and by. I have been led aside from the line of my remarks. I was proceeding, in the first place, to speak of the first objection, and that was, that we avoided the power already existing to legislate on the subject and to do everything by way of legislation. That I have spoken of. Another was that we deliver over these people bound hand and foot to their former masters.

Does this amendment do any such thing? Are they not there now to the same extent? Take the Constitution as it is, are they there, or are they not? The States may legislate and exclude them if they please. When we simply provide one safeguard for them by inflicting a penalty, a punishment if you please, in the loss of political power upon the abuse of that power which the States now have, are we handing these people over in a style worthy of such epithets as were applied by the Senator to those who are the authors and proposers of this resolution? Sir, I am at a loss to understand how it accomplishes any such thing. The Senator did not explain. He stated the proposition, but he left it to stand upon the force of his own forcible and eloquent language alone.

A more serious objection, in my mind, is the query whether it accomplishes in fact all that we desire to accomplish, whether it may not be avoided, whether by some trick of legislation, some form of speech which does not apply to the language of the resolution, it may not be left to operate in fact in the direction in which we design it should not, while the letter of the law is followed. That is my fear with regard to it, and that is what I wish Senators to look at; and if those defects do exist, I hope, before the resolution goes from our possession, either to the people or the other House, that all these things will be provided for. I do not pretend to point them out.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in his very eloquent and able and exhaustive argument yesterday—one for which I am very much obliged to him, for although he did not approve in terms of this resolution, yet the principles he advocated with so much force all went, in my judgment, to show its necessity and to give it strength, if rightly understood—proposed something instead of the resolution. I have alluded to it. It is a proposed act of Congress; and permit me to say a few words as to its force and effect, and let us see how far the remedy would be followed. If he will excuse me, I cannot help alluding to the fact that it is in one sense like a very small dipper with a very long handle, for the preamble is very much more diffuse than the proposed enactment itself. His preamble is in these words:

Whereas it is provided in the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government; and whereas, by reason of the failure of certain States to maintain governments which Congress can recognize, it has become the duty of the United States, standing in the place of guarantor, where the principal has made a lapse, to secure to such States, according to the requirement of the guarantee, governments republican in form; and whereas further, it is provided in a recent constitutional amendment that Congress may "enforce" the prohibition of slavery by "appropriate legislation," and it is important to this end that all relics of slavery should be removed, including all distinction of rights on account of color; now, therefore, to carry out the guarantee of a republican form of government and to enforce the prohibition of slavery—

I looked to see what came next. I supposed that after that preamble we should have some adequate machinery provided for the enforcement and the security of these rights; that we should have the matter put to the courts, and if the courts could not accomplish it, that we should have the aid of the military power, thus shocking the sensibilities of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] again. I do not know what good it does to merely provide by law that the provisions of the Constitution shall be enforced, without saying how, in what manner, by what machinery, in what way, to what extent, or how it is to be accomplished. Let me ask the honorable Senator this question: here is a legislative declaration; suppose the States say they will not do it, how can your bill prevent their having their own way? You do not send them to the courts. How does it read?

That in all States lately declared to be in rebellion there shall be no oligarchy, aristocracy, caste, or monopoly invested with peculiar privileges and powers, and there shall be no denial of rights, civil or political, on account of color or race.

Let us take the first clause. Does not the Constitution say that now? Does the Constitution authorize oligarchies, aristocracies, monopolies? Not at all. Are you not as safe under the Constitution as you are under an act of Congress? Why reenact the Constitution of the United States and put it in a bill? What do you accomplish by it? How is that a remedy? It is simply as if it read in this way: whereas it is provided in the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, therefore we declare that there shall be a republican form of government, and nothing else. That is all that there is of it in that particular. What it is to avail practically is more than I can tell. I presume the honorable Senator will very easily explain it to me, but it reminds me—I say it with all respect—of a sort of poetical travesty of a law argument of an eminent lawyer of his own State, running somewhat in this way:

"Let my opponents do their worst,
Still my first point is point the first;
Which fully proves my case, because
All statute laws are statute laws."

The sequitur is obvious; the case is proved, because inasmuch as the Constitution provides that there shall be no aristocracy, no oligarchy, no monopoly, therefore Congress has resolved that there shall be not anything of the kind, but provided no mode whatever in which or by which to prevent it. Why not go further? If it is necessary to provide that there shall be no oligarchy, no aristocracy, no monopoly in the States once slave States, why not so provide for all the States? We have the same power of legislation.

Mr. SUMNER. "All the States" is the language of the proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hold the proposition in my hand, and have read from it.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. It was altered when I sent it up to the desk. The Senator will find it in the Globe as it was offered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I took it from the printed copy as laid on my table. I will read it as it is in the Globe:

That there shall be no oligarchy, aristocracy, caste, or monopoly, invested with peculiar privileges and powers, and there shall be no denial of rights, civil or political, on account of color or race anywhere within the limits of the United States, or the jurisdiction thereof.

A few moments ago, when I was arguing against the power to legislate in this way in regard to civil and political rights, on the ground of the guarantee, the Senator told me that he contended for no such thing, that he confined it to the States which were lately in rebellion.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there? I should like to explain to him why that is altered. Last Friday this Senate solemnly declared that under the constitutional amendment it had power to decree the equal rights of all persons everywhere throughout the United States, without distinction of color. The moment that that was declared, I said to friends about me on both sides of this Chamber that that fixed the duty of Congress with regard also to political rights. If Congress can decree equality in civil rights, a fortiori, because it is much more important, it can decree equality in political rights; and as the preamble to my proposition recited two reasons or moving causes to the resolution, one the guarantee clause, and the other the constitutional amendment, I felt that it was my duty, acting upon the vote of the Senate, to insist that this declaration of equality for all should be coextensive with the Republic, claiming as I do under the guarantee clause that it operates necessarily ex vi termini within all those States where there has been a lapse of government, and claiming that under the recent constitutional amendment it operates everywhere within the limits of the Republic. That is the explanation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am obliged to the honorable gentleman for the explanation, but I confess my utter stupidity; I do not understand it, unless he means that in the first place he intended when he introduced his resolution to provide that there should be no oligarchy, &c., in the States which had been in rebellion, confining it to them, and leaving the other States to have oligarchy or aristocracy or anything they liked, and we not interfering. This he based on the guarantee clause. I suppose he will not deny that he knew all about the effect of the recent constitutional amendment at the same time.

But with reference to the rest of the States, he does not rely on the guarantee clause, but he relies on the power to enforce the prohibition against slavery.

Mr. SUMNER. The power to carry out the constitutional amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And that constitutional amendment abolishes slavery, does it not?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then there is a provision authorizing Congress to carry it into effect. So far as the slave States are concerned, he relies for this provision on the guarantee clause; and so far as the free States are concerned where there is no slavery and has not been, he relies on the slavery clause.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the Senator's statement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The statement is perfectly plain. It was drawn originally, the honorable Senator says, on the guarantee clause, and confined to the slave States, and not extending even to all the slave States, but confined to the confederate States simply, under the guarantee clause on the ground of lapse. I call attention to that, and he says that now he has extended it to all the States under the provision of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, which gives Congress this power. The guarantee clause is enough for the confederate States, which have lapsed, and you need the clause in relation to the abolition of slavery to prevent it in the free States. That is the clause under which the Senator says it is extended to the free States. If that explanation is satisfactory to the Senator it is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Then the last clause of the Senator's resolution is, "And this statute, made in pursuance of the Constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any such State to the contrary notwithstanding?" Would not a constitutional statute be the supreme law of the land without the addition of those words? By enacting a statute and saying at the close of it, "this statute enacted in pursuance of the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land," do those words make it so? Would the Supreme Court be barred from examining into that question and seeing whether the law thus passed was in pursuance of any power granted by the Constitution?

I have examined this scheme simply because it is the remedy proposed by the honorable Senator. Contending that the proposition which has been brought in here by the committee of fifteen, and approved by more than two thirds of the House of Representatives, is merely trifling with our duties, an outrage, an abandonment of moral principle on the part of all who are concerned in it, the Senator proposes a remedy. I have seen how far the remedy went in some particulars, and I now ask him what particular force he applies or thinks due to this last clause, which declares that this statute shall be the supreme law of the land? Does this clause provide the machinery by which it is to be carried into execution? Does it provide courts to protect rights? Does it provide a military force? Does it provide anything? Words all, and words that may be repealed and struck from the statute-book to-morrow, having no force in themselves. So far as it does go it reenacts the Constitution. So far as it declares at the close what the Constitution declares in the same words substantially it is, of course, unnecessary. Then it leaves it to float upon the waters and take its chance of all the adverse currents which may strike it.

I should not have examined this proposition thus minutely had it not been for the very violent—I had almost said virulent—attack made upon the resolution of the committee. As the Senator chose to make that attack, it becomes, of course, my duty to examine his remedy to see the force there is in it, how far it goes, what it will do, what rights it will secure, what evils it will prevent. None, sir, none. It is of no more consequence to put that law upon the statute-book with regard to human rights, anywhere or under any circumstances, than it is to put one totally irrelevant to the whole subject, because it has no sanction, it has no penalty, it has nothing in it which can accomplish the purpose. It is a mere legislative declaration, and a legislative declaration of a fact that exists, as the Senator says, and as I am willing to concede for the sake of the argument, in the Constitution itself.

Mr. SUMNER. That is all I intended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all the Senator intended! Then where is his protection of human rights? If all he meant was a word upon the statute-book, what good has he done to him who was once a slave in securing him his rights? Sir, I am afraid that there are too many of these things—protections of human rights consisting of words alone! We, the committee of fifteen, recommend something more than words; weak it may be, but containing some force; having perhaps not sufficient present effect, but calculated to reach far into the future. It has that good if it has none other. This, according to the honorable Senator's admission—and he proposes it as an amendment, to strike out the whole resolution and substitute this—he intended simply as a legislative declaration of not the slightest force in the world. Of course, Mr. President, after that declaration of the honorable Senator it would ill become me to comment any further upon it and to show that it would be wholly without effect.

Mr. President, no man knows when he gets talking where he may wander, unless he is in the habit of arranging his thoughts better than I am mine. When I commenced this discussion I supposed that in the course of twenty minutes or half an hour, I could say all I wanted to say, and I should have said all I then wanted to say on the subject; but I have been led aside and astray by the collateral matters that have arisen here, until I have probably exhausted the patience of the Senate; I certainly have exhausted my own strength; but I will say to the Senate that I have not even finished that which I intended to say with regard to certain other matters. Believing that I might well discuss under this resolution the power of Congress in relation to the situation of these Confederate States at this time, and necessarily connected with it, what it would be wise to do. I had thought of taking some notice of the opinions advanced by the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] a while ago, and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN,] in reference to the principles upon which we are acting. But, sir—

Mr. JOHNSON and others. Let us adjourn, and you can go on to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, Mr. President, I will not speak two days. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. I would rather omit entirely all I have to say on the subject now and take some other occasion, than to have an adjournment on my account.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sorry for that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And really, Mr. President, I do not know that it would be just or right to the Senate under existing circumstances for me to speak upon any other subject than that which is immediately under the consideration of the body. I do not approve of traveling into matters that are collateral, because it is simply availing ourselves of a place here to give utterance to ideas that do not perhaps belong to the occasion. I will follow out, therefore, my own rule, particularly as I have not strength enough left to do otherwise; but I wish to say in closing that I commend this joint resolution to the careful consideration of the Senate. It is not all that we could desire; it is not all that our constituents could wish; it does not accomplish, as it stands now, all perhaps that it might accomplish; but it is an important step in the right direction. It gives the sanction of Congress in so many words to an important, leading, effective idea. It opens a way by which the southern mind—to speak of it as the southern mind—may be led to do that which is right and just. I see that the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] looks at me as if he thought that that was not a very safe supposition; but I have hopes, great hopes, of those who were recently confederates; and I believe that now that they have been taught that they cannot do evil to all the extent they might desire with impunity, and when their attention is turned of necessity in the right direction, the road will seem so pleasant to their feet, or at any rate will seem so agreeable to their love of power, that they will be willing to walk in the direction that we have pointed. If they do, what is accomplished? In process of time, under this constitutional amendment, if it should be adopted, they are led to enlarge their franchise. That necessarily will lead them to consider how much further they can go, what is necessary in order to fit their people for its exercise, thus leading to education, thus leading to a greater degree of civilization, thus bringing up an oppressed and downtrodden race to an equality, if capable of an equality, and I hope it may be, with their white brethren, children of the same father. And, sir, if this is done, (we cannot hope for it in a day, but if in a few years this is accomplished, and accomplished by the steady and silent operation of this constitutional provision which applies itself to the interests and to the love of power of men,) some of us may hope to live—I probably may not, but the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may—to see the time when by their own act and under the effect of an enlightened study of their own interests, all men may be placed upon the same broad constitutional level, enjoying the same rights and seeking happiness in the same way and under the same advantages; and that is all that we could ask.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I rise to ask the courtesy of the Senate, which I have never asked before, and I do it the more readily from the fact that I speak very rarely in this body. I desire to address the Senate; and the notes that I have made by way of preparation are at my room, and unless some gentleman prefers to go on now, I should very much prefer either an adjournment or an executive session, so that I may be permitted to speak to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me? Let this pass over informally so that we can take up a little measure of legislation.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. With the understanding that I have the floor for to-morrow, I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor.) The Chair suggests that the proper disposition would be a motion to postpone the pending question until to-morrow.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that it be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SCHOOLS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 35) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Public Lands reported a substitute. I do not think it will be necessary to read the original bill, but let the substitute be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the substitute reported for the bill will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That there be granted to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, one million acres of the lands of the United States subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre, or less than that sum, to be divided between the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, according to the population thereof, as ascertained by the census of 1850, for the support of public schools.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the city of Washington and the city of Georgetown and county of Washington shall not select, locate, nor hold the land granted in the first section of this act, nor any part thereof; but land scrip shall be issued for the same to the city of Washington, the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington, corresponding in quantity with the land granted in the first section of this act, and to be apportioned as in the first section is provided, said scrip to be sold by said cities and county and assigned by such officers and in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may order and prescribe; and the assignees of such scrip may locate the same upon any unoccupied public land of the United States subject to sale at $1 25 per acre, or less; but mineral lands shall not be subject to location.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the expenses of the sale and assignment of such scrip, and the investment and management of the fund realized from the sale thereof, shall be paid by the said cities of Washington and Georgetown and county of Washington, so that the entire proceeds shall be applied without any diminution whatever to the purpose herein mentioned.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all moneys derived from the sale of the scrip hereinbefore provided for shall be invested in the stocks of the United States yielding not less than five per cent. upon the par value thereof; that the moneys so invested shall constitute a perpetual fund, the capital of which shall remain forever undiminished, and the interest of which shall be inviolably appropriated by said cities and county to the support and maintenance of public schools in said cities and county for the education of the children in said cities and county between the ages of five and seventeen years, to be used in the support and maintenance of such schools, without distinction of color or race of the children attending them.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any portion of the fund invested as before provided, or any portion of the interest thereon, shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by the city or county to which it belongs, so that the fund shall remain forever undiminished; and no portion of the fund or the interest shall be applied toward the purchase of any site or for the construction of any school-house or building.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That land officers shall receive the same fees for locating land scrip issued under the provisions of this act as is now allowed for the location of military bounty land warrants under existing laws: Provided, Their maximum compensation shall not thereby be increased.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to strike out, in the fourth section, the words "without distinction of color or race of the children attending them." I do not propose to debate this very new subject in the Senate of the United States; but as I wish to make one straightforward record while I live, and that a record in reference to the white and black races, I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether in this bill by this particular provision he means that the funds shall be equally distributed, or on the other hand that the children of different colors shall go to the same school. What is his purpose on that subject?

Mr. WILSON. We have provided by law for the establishment of colored schools here. Since emancipation we passed a school system for this District, a most excellent one, too, and under it a large number of colored schools have been established. I understand the bill to mean simply—and I think the Senator from Indiana must certainly understand it—that it divides the money pro rata according to the children, without any distinction of color, and those in the colored schools will receive the same benefit that those receive who are in the white schools.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no objection to the poor children of the District of Columbia or elsewhere being educated; but having been here now for some seven years, I never saw such zeal manifested in reference to the education of the children of this District until it became necessary to educate a large class of black children. We have a great many poor children in my State, and we provide schools for them. There were a great many poor children in the District of Columbia before the abolition of slavery; but there was no proposition then to take a million acres of the public lands and apply them to schools for children, either white or black, in this District, or in any State of the Union. I do not wish, however, to discuss the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the honorable member from Massachusetts to say that the law as it now stands authorize the establishment of schools for the education of colored children, but does not make it obligatory on the schools where white children are received to receive the colored children; that is to say, there is no authority to have a mixture of children in any one school. I understood the honorable member to say so.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. If that is so, it cannot be done under this amendment. I understand the whole amendment is that the appropriation which is here made is to be applied to the support and maintenance of all the schools. If it had said "all the schools," it would have included the colored schools as well as the white schools, and nothing more is done by superadding the words "without distinction of color or race."

It is true that perhaps until now no proposition of this sort has been made, either with reference to this District or any other part of the United States, whether included within a State or included within a Territory. But whatever may have been the origin or the motive for the establishment of schools and their support, as far as I am concerned, I would very willingly vote anything in reason to carry out the object. If the poorer class of white children in the District have not been properly educated before, and we are about to educate them now only because there are black children to be educated, that furnishes no objection to me in voting for the bill. I want all to be educated, and perhaps, looking to results, looking to policy, it is more peculiarly necessary that the blacks should be educated because they are without the means of educating themselves, whereas the mass of the white people have the means of educating their own children. I shall therefore vote for the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say, Mr. President, to the Senator from Delaware, that I offered a bill containing this proposition to give a million acres of public land for educational purposes in the District of Columbia seven or eight years ago, some years before emancipation, and I think I have offered it annually from that time to this, or nearly every year. It has been in the Committee on the District of Columbia several times. Last Congress, I think, it went to the Committee on Public Lands and was not acted upon. This year it went to the Committee on Public Lands, and they have made a report in favor of it. I certainly hope that the Senate will pass the bill, that it will become a law, and that the children in this District, without distinction of color or race, of white or black, will have the advantages of it.

The Senator from Maryland tells us that the white people here have the means to educate their children. I think, if the Senator will read the reports made annually for the last seven or eight years in this District, he will come to the conclusion that they have not had the means to do it, or if they had the means they have neglected to use them.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say so. I said if it was at all necessary to draw a distinction between the colored and the white children, it would be better to educate the colored, because as a general rule the white population had the means of educating their own children, which cannot be said as a general rule applicable to the colored race, not that there are not poor white children who ought to be educated.

Mr. WILSON. Only about one third of the white children of the District of Columbia are in the common schools of the District. The reason is, as everybody knows, that the people of the District of Columbia are a very poor people. There are but few ways here to earn much money. By building the Capitol extension and the other public works in this city, we have brought a great number of laboring men and mechanics and poor people here to live, and many of them come from places where there are good schools open to all, where the children of the poor are educated at the public expense. That is the case in some sections of the country, and it ought to be so everywhere. At this very time, as the last annual report shows, only about one third of the white children of the District of Columbia are being educated in the public schools. We have got a great number of poor white children here that have no means of education.

Then we have undertaken, by what I think to be a very wise policy, to establish schools for the education of colored children here, and they are short of means; in fact, the great trouble in this District is the want of money. We have set apart during our history some seventy-five or eighty million acres of public lands for the benefit of schools in the States. It was a wise policy. Sir, we ought to have established at the foundation of this District a system of public schools, and this District should have been the pattern of the whole country, where children without distinction of color or race or condition of life could obtain a good common-school education. We neglected it, and we see the result.

Now, sir, I think considering the poverty of this District which is real, considering the fact that we own a vast amount of property here, that we have brought hundreds of people here to labor on the public works, that they are rearing families and are unable to educate them here as they would be in some other portions of the country, considering the fact that we long ago established a wise policy of setting apart portions of the public domain in the new States for the purposes of common-school education, I think we ought to pass a bill of this kind. I only regret that it is so little; but it may give perhaps a million dollars to the people of this District, the annual income of which will go not to build school-houses but for the purpose of educating children, and will be divided according to the number of children between certain ages without distinction of color or race. Nobody doubts that it will be a great blessing to the people of the District and improve the cause of education and consequently the force and powers of the community, moral, physical, and intellectual, that it will be a great advantage to them; and it does seem to me that it is a wise and sound policy to do it. I think that we ought not to go on as we have done, letting the children of the people of the District of Columbia, thousands of whom have been brought here by our wants and our needs, who are poor laboring people, go without the means of education when we have the power to aid them. I am therefore for this measure. I believe it to be a wise one.

I think farther, whatever we can fairly and properly do to build up the city of Washington, to improve the condition of this District, to make the District what it ought to be, we ought to do.

Mr. GRIMES. I think, Mr. President, that there need not be a very great controversy between the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Massachusetts on the subject of the colored schools, for I imagine that if this bill shall pass there will not be a great many either of white or of colored schools supported by the funds that will be created by it. I should almost be willing to guaranty that these lands will not net to the city governments of Georgetown and Washington, and to the District of Columbia, ten cents an acre. Such, I can assure the Senator from Massachusetts, has been the experience heretofore on the part of all to whom grants of this kind have been made, and such will be the case from my knowledge of the authorities that have the control of affairs here in these cities and in this District in regard to this scrip if it shall be issued.

The Senator from Massachusetts bases this grant first on the poverty of the city of Washington. In regard to that the Senator is mistaken. According to the assessment returns, this is one of the wealthiest cities there is in the United States. There may be poor people here, and doubtless there are; but the assessment returns show what the value of the property is. Will the Senator produce them? Why, sir, the poor people of whom he speaks, who have been brought here as mechanics from the North and West, have really the control of the city government. Why do they not levy a tax on the valuable property that is located here? The trouble is not that the people are poor, but the trouble is that they are not willing to tax the property that is subject to taxation for the purpose of educating their children; and no grant of land that can be made, and no scrip that the Senator can get us to authorize to be issued is going to improve the people of the District of Columbia in that regard. Let him turn out as a missionary and lecture the people in their various wards on the necessity of education, and when he has brought them up to the standard that will justify us in putting money into their hands for this object, let him come in here and ask for an appropriation of money out of the Treasury. That we can grant, that is the direct way of reaching this thing; but the indirect way that is now proposed, which, while it may possibly be a slight advantage to the citizens of the District, is destined to be a very great disadvantage to the new States, is not the kind of legislation that we should have.

Mr. President, I suppose that the members of this body understand that this bill, if it shall pass, will be the establishment of a new principle. The Senator says that we have been in the habit of making grants of lands to the western States for education. That is true; but they have been granted upon altogether a different principle than this. The Government had vast tracts of land. That land was subdivided, by the authority of Congress, into townships, and those townships were subdivided into thirty-six sections each. You wanted to sell those lands. They were the means from which you expected to derive your revenue for the purpose of carrying on your Government; and you said to the citizens of the North and East, "If you will go out West and buy these lands, and pay us $1 25 an acre for them, we will set apart every sixteenth section in each one of these townships, which shall be used by you, and those who may associate with you, for the purpose of educating your children." It was an inducement to the people from the East, and from other sections of the country, to go to these western lands and locate on them, and pay into your Treasury the money that you said you would take for these lands. But here you propose to grant to the city of Washington lands or scrip, which is the same thing, for the purpose of establishing schools in this District. You might with equal propriety issue scrip to support the schools in the city of Boston.

But if there is such a necessity for the support of schools here, come to us and ask us in a manly, straightforward way to take money out of the Treasury. Does not the Senator know, does not the experience of everybody go to show, that this scrip will in a very short time and at a very low rate find its way into the pockets of the wealthy capitalists, and then it will be located, spread out on a township of land or several townships of land, and that land will remain for ten, fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years without having a single occupant on it? And that is the danger and the damage that it is to work to the States where this land will be located and held in trust for the benefit of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

In 1839, I think—the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GERRITT] can probably tell me the date—there was granted to a charitable institution in Kentucky a township of land in the State of Florida; and one of the first subjects that I heard under discussion when I came to Washington was a bill introduced at the instance of the State of Florida to compel the State of Kentucky to sell that land. I suppose it has not been sold to this day. The argument that was urged by the State of Florida was that here was an entire township of land in one of their best counties that was owned by the State of Kentucky, granted for a charitable purpose, it is true, but there was not a single bona fide settler upon it; it retarded the settlement and prevented the development of the country. Now, the effect of the Senator's bill is precisely to accomplish the same thing in the western States, not in my State—for I am not speaking for her; her public lands are all exhausted; but I am speaking for the other States and Territories. We have been through this experience; and we have got in some portion of our State almost whole counties taken up by non-residents in this way, preventing the settlement, preventing immigrants from coming there, preventing the development of the State; and I am now arguing for the purpose of preventing other States and Territories from having the same experience.

Mr. JOHNSON. From the organization of Iowa as a Territory and up to the present time, how much public land, either in the State or out of the State, has Iowa received?

Mr. GRIMES. I cannot state the precise amount or number of acres, but I will state this: that some of the Senator's constituents, and I presume he was instrumental in passing the bill through Congress, succeeded in securing a grant of land to certain railroads in the State of Iowa. Those railroads are owned entirely by eastern capitalists. One of the conditions of that grant was that every alternate section of land along the line of those railroads should be increased in value and raised from $1 25 an acre to $2 50 an acre; the result of which was that the settlers who went upon the lands were compelled to pay just double the price they would have paid if the grant had not been made. If the Senator regards that as a grant of land to Iowa, we had, I think, somewhere in the neighborhood of eighteen hundred thousand acres of land granted; but the Government is not injured by it. The Government derives just as much revenue from one half of the land that she would have derived from the whole of the land if the grant had not been made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not suppose the Government was injured: I only thought that perhaps Iowa was benefited.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not see any deduction that can legitimately be drawn from the inquiry of the Senator, in connection with this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think it is desirable, if this bill is to become a law, to prevent the location of the scrip in any one of the States at all events. With that view, I offer this amendment—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) There is a pending question before the Senate by way of amendment to an amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. If that shall be rejected, I propose to offer, as a proviso, that not over one hundred thousand acres of this scrip shall be located in any one State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order after a vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to say that I concur in all that has been said by the honorable Senator from Iowa in regard to this bill. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in the pursuit of his object, which is a worthy one, will show to the Senate the amount devoted to public education here both of white children and colored children, and its insufficiency, I will vote with him any sum of money that is necessary to the support of a proper system of education here from the national Treasury; but I agree entirely with what the Senator from Iowa has said: first, as to the insufficiency for purposes of education in the District of a donation of lands; next, as to the mischievous results that will almost certainly flow from such a donation; and therefore I shall vote against the amendments proposed and against the bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. After years of effort we succeeded in grafting upon our laws the principle of homesteads. It was a long contest. In 1852 I remember voting for it in the lower House. So far as this bill goes it repeals the homestead principle. Most of the Senators are aware of the great injury that the holding of lands by non-resident speculators inflicts on the new States. The Senator from Iowa has expressed that idea. It is the greatest infliction that can be visited on a new State. This scrip will depreciate in value, go into the hands of speculators, the land will be entered by them; and I desire to suggest that most of the land will be located in the State that I represent. We are the only State now that has large quantities of desirable public land; and the idea of locating a million acres of land in the State of Kansas, a body of land forty miles square, to be held indefinitely by non-residents is monstrous. Let me tell the Senator from Massachusetts this is educating the children of this District at the expense of the children of Kansas and the new States. We cannot establish schools where such an amount of non-resident land is held.

The Senator from Massachusetts will not vote more heartily a sum of money to educate the children of this District than I will. Let us do directly what he proposes, and vote the money. I was not aware that such a bill was before the Committee on Public Lands, or I should have certainly appeared before that committee and protested in the name of my State and my constituents against it. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, that so far as the money to be realized from this land scrip is concerned, it will be nothing. The proposition is to allow a million acres of land to be held in the new States by non-residents, resulting in no benefit to the children of this District. I ask Senators to pause before passing this bill. Announcing my willingness to vote any amount of money out of the public Treasury that is necessary to educate the children of this District without distinction of color, I ask the Senate to pause before passing this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, if I believed what some of these Senators from the Northwest tell us, that this proposition to grant one million out of nine hundred million acres of public land for the benefit of schools was to fall with crushing power upon the northwestern States, and especially upon the State of the Senator of Kansas, I should certainly not press it on the Senate. I am among those who believe that God Almighty made the country for those who occupy it. I have always voted and I mean to vote, in spite of the narrow gauge that is brought in here by some Senators to run upon, for using the public land in such a way that it will improve the condition of the new States, educate their people, make internal improvements, settle up those States, and improve their condition in every way. I have so voted here, and I mean to vote so as long as I have a seat here.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Did you vote for the homestead bill?

Mr. WILSON. I voted for the homestead bill, and am for the homestead bill. I have been always for it since I was able to comprehend everything connected with it. I will say further than that, that I voted with the greatest reluctance for a bill passed here a year or two ago making a large grant of land for agricultural colleges. I did not believe in the wisdom of it, and I have not seen yet that it was entirely wise; but I know that the land granted has realized about eighty cents to the acre to the States. The scrip has sold and brought that to the persons who have held it.

Mr. GRIMES. What States?

Mr. WILSON. Several of them got eighty cents to the acre, and I have no doubt that this scrip will bring about that amount. We have got nine hundred million acres of public domain, and we have got the homestead law. The Senator from Kansas introduces almost every other day some proposition for a grant of land for railroads or some other improvements in the State of Kansas, and I have been accustomed to vote for all such measures, because I thought they developed the country, and made the land that we reserved and everybody else's land more valuable. But now here is a small measure to take a million acres out of nine hundred million acres of land, for the benefit of the schools of the District of Columbia, the capital of this great nation, where we ought to have good school-houses, pattern houses, and where we ought to have good teachers, and ought to have all our poor children educated, ought to have the means by which every poor white boy and black boy, too, can obtain a good education.

Sir, I said the people of this District were poor. The Senator from Iowa tells me that it is one of the wealthiest districts in the country. There may be some men of wealth here—

Mr. GRIMES. I was not talking about wealthy men, but the wealth of the District, the assessable property of the District.

Mr. WILSON. There is unquestionably some property, but if you can find a poorer spot on God's heritage than the District of Columbia, I should like to have it pointed out. There is an immense population here, black and white, living from hand to mouth, ready to do any sort of thing to get the means to get through the day and the night, and who wake up the next day without anything to begin upon. I believe that our policy in erecting these public buildings, this very Capitol where we are assembled, has brought to the District a great many laboring men who have poor families. If these laboring men were in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, or in almost any other part of the country, their children would have the means of education; here it is very difficult to obtain them. I want to give them the means; and as the District of Columbia is under our control, I think we ought to aid them in it. The Senator from California suggests we shall not get it.

Mr. CONNESS. Not in this way.

Mr. WILSON. We shall get at least seven or eight hundred thousand dollars for educational purposes out of this measure. I have not a doubt of it.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. As I do not wish to occupy any time again on the subject, I wish to call the Senator's attention to how this matter of donation of lands for purposes of education works. In 1850, when California became a State of the Union, she fell heir to five hundred thousand acres of land, which was a donation made, I believe, by law in 1841, for purposes of internal improvements; but California, as she thought wisely, in her constitution devoted that land to the purposes of education. Sixteen years have transpired since the State came to have a nominal title, such as this act would give to the District of Columbia, to those lands, and in that time five thousand acres of the five hundred thousand acres have been set apart by the Government of the United States to the State of California—five thousand of the five hundred thousand acres in sixteen years! The State issued scrip, as the District of Columbia probably will if this act shall pass, and it has resulted in complications that no person can understand nor even render clear now. After sixteen years five thousand acres of land are all of the five hundred thousand that have been set apart by the Government of the United States for the purposes of education. I tell the Senator, because I am equally earnest with him to aid in educating the children of this District, to ask for money so that you can get education, for you cannot get it from land, in my opinion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question: he stated that I was in the daily habit of introducing bills—

Mr. WILSON. Every other day.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The railroad grants. Each of those bills provides that the odd sections shall be given to the railroads, and the even sections shall be increased in value double and sold for $2 50 per acre. There is no provision in this bill from my reading of it that prevents the cities of Georgetown and Washington from taking that particular land that we hold at $2 50 per acre, so that instead of granting them a million acres of land at $1 25 you grant them a million acres of land that we sell at $2 50 per acre, by my reading of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. It may be—

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me a moment. The Senator from Kansas is mistaken. This bill allows the scrip that may be issued according to its provisions to be located upon any land of the United States subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre. It expressly excludes the location upon any land the price of which is above $1 25 an acre. Any lands that are of less value than $1 25 an acre may be located with the scrip, and not any above that price. I will read the provision to the Senator from Kansas so there shall be no question about it:

That there be granted to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, one million acres of the lands of the United States subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre, or less than that sum.

The same provision is carried into the section regulating the location of the scrip, the second section, which I will also read:

And the assignees of such scrip may locate the same upon any unoccupied public land of the United States subject to sale at $1 25 per acre, or less.

In the Committee on Public Lands, with a great deal of reluctance I could not agree to favor this bill, but I gave the Senator from Massachusetts a little assistance in framing it, and I think that if it is the purpose of Congress at all to aid the cause of education in this District this perhaps is as safe a bill as can be drawn. In drafting the amendment it was the purpose to avoid the difficulties that have been suggested by Senators. I think no Senator appreciates in a higher degree the injury done to a new country by large quantities of the land falling into the hands of non-residents, and I certainly should not, in drafting or aiding to draft any bill, seek to bring about such a result. I would desire to avoid it, and it is avoided by the provisions of this bill, as far as it is possible in the nature of the case. The land itself is not given to the District of Columbia; neither of the cities nor the county can locate the land. The Secretary of the Interior issues scrip representing upon its face a million acres, in suitable sizes for location, as is provided in the agricultural college law of two or three years ago. The Secretary of the Interior will issue to each of these cities scrip, as the population of the city may entitle it to, and the city will then sell the scrip in the market, and the purchaser of the scrip will locate the land in the western States or Territories. This does not cause the lands of the western States and Territories to fall into the hands of non-residents to a greater extent than existing laws will allow. Land warrants that have been issued to soldiers are located in the same way. The scrip that is issued by the Interior Department under the agricultural college law is located precisely in the same way.

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator say that if this bill shall pass there will not be any greater facilities than there are now? It is true that under the land-warrant system vast quantities of land were taken up, whole counties, and are held now by non-residents and unoccupied, because the warrants could be got at the rate of about seventy or eighty cents an acre. When this scrip is bought at twenty, twenty-five, or thirty cents an acre the owner of it can afford to enter and hold the land for a long time and pay taxes on it, when he could not afford to enter it and hold it and pay taxes on it if he entered the land at $1 25 an acre. That is the difference between an entry under the scrip system authorized by this act and the present system of paying $1 25 an acre.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, I understand that, and I did not wish to be understood as saying that speculators would be as likely to buy land with money at $1 25 an acre as to locate it with scrip which costs them eighty cents. My purpose was to say just this: that it gives the same opportunity, and no greater opportunity than is given by the agricultural college law, or the bounty land warrant law. It is the purchaser of the scrip who makes the location. A wants to go into the western country to buy lands; he finds this scrip in market at eighty cents an acre, and he buys it or uses it, whether for purposes of speculation or for the purpose of a homestead I cannot say. There are many citizens who would prefer to buy this scrip when they wish to get a homestead in the western country, rather than locate under the provisions of the homestead bill. I was an advocate of that bill when a member of the other House, and if I had been in Congress at the time of its passage, I should have voted for the homestead bill; but there is a serious difficulty in the location of lands anywhere under the homestead bill. Actual settlement and continued occupation for a series of years, I think five years, are required before the settler gets a title. If I were going to make a home and a farm in the western country, if I could possibly raise the money to buy the scrip at eighty cents and locate it on the land, I would prefer it rather than have my title held up in the General Land Office five years, and at the end of that time have to prove continued occupation and improvement through a series of years.

I have not been in favor of appropriating the public lands to any purposes outside of the land States themselves, and therefore had I been in Congress I should not, in all probability, have voted for the agricultural college bill, but I am not able to see how any Senator who supported that measure can oppose the present measure. This bill proposes to use the public lands to educate the children of the District of Columbia. Is that a purpose to which the Government of the United States is willing to lend its aid and support? This District of Columbia is under the legislation of Congress, and if the District were a part of a State in which there were public lands, I should certainly vote for such a measure as this; but having no interest in the public lands, except as its citizens form a portion of the population of the United States, I am not willing to vote for it for that simple reason. But the framework of the bill is not subject to the objections that have been suggested, as I think. If the District of Columbia could go out into Kansas and locate forty miles square, the objection of the Senator from Kansas would have very great force, it would certainly control the action of Congress; but if the District of Columbia is simply authorized to issue scrip and sell it to all the persons who may wish to buy lands there for homes or for other purposes, the bill is certainly not objectionable to the reasons so earnestly urged by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana what is the difference between these two cities going into Kansas and locating that land in a body, or permitting the scrip to go, as it will go, into the hands of a company of men or one individual of wealth who will locate it in a body. We have had some experience in this. That is to be the result. It is not to be divided out among actual settlers, but to be sold to speculators and to be entered in a body to remain there to curse my children and the children of the citizens of Kansas and other new States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question of the Senator from Kansas I will try to answer. If one man could buy this scrip and go and locate the whole of it in Kansas, the objection would be well urged, but we have got to take facts as they are. We know that no one individual is going to buy this scrip. We know from the history of the past that this scrip will fall into the hands of thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of people, if there were enough for that purpose.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There was scrip issued to the Sac and Fox Indians in our State. One hundred and ten thousand acres of that scrip fell into the hands of one individual, thirty thousand to another, and twenty-odd thousand to another. There are over one hundred and sixty thousand acres of land to be held by three individuals in the center of our State, on scrip similar to this, issued in the same way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a singular circumstance that I never heard of before. My attention had never been called to the Indian scrip. I believe Indian matters are very likely to fall into the hands of a few persons. It seems that the Indians are used for the benefit of a very few people, and their scrip seems to result to the benefit of a very few people. Now, I know the fact that the land warrants that were issued to the soldiers under the acts of 1850 and 1855 did not fall into the hands of a few men, and I understand the fact to be that the scrip that is being sold by the States under the agricultural college law does not fall into the hands of a few men, but is purchased by men as they desire and need it, very much of it falling into the hands of men who make homes upon the lands where they locate the scrip.

This is all I desire to say, simply that this bill is framed as carefully as a bill can be, I think, to secure the ends intended, and also to prevent the accumulation of the lands in the hands of non-residents, to secure the fund permanently for the benefit of schools in this District; and the money that is received cannot be used for the support of schools, but when realized is to be invested in Government stock and the interest used for the support of schools. Should this scrip sell for eighty cents per acre, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, it would bring $800,000; that at six per cent. would be $48,000 a year, which would be a great benefit to the schools. If on principle I could support the bill, I should be very happy to do so.

Mr. STEWART. I think we might avoid the difficulty of the scrip going on the market for a trifle by a slight amendment. I move to amend in the ninth line of the second section, after the word "sold," by inserting "at not less than eighty cents per acre."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will not be in order until a vote is taken on the pending amendment. The present question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that I ought to mingle in the debate on this subject. I consider it so peculiarly a western question that I feel some little delicacy in saying anything on the subject; but from my connection with the Committee on the District of Columbia, I feel a little interest in the passage of the bill, if it can be passed without violating the interest which is represented here by Senators. In my country we make provision directly out of the public treasury in support of the schools. If the people in the District of Columbia had a treasury, I should think that a better way; but they have not, and they are obliged to rely in great part upon the action of Congress.

Now, what has particularly struck me is the character of the opposition to the bill. It is said in the first place that a grant of one million acres will not amount to anything, will come to nothing at all; that it will not benefit the schools; not more than $50,000, it is said, will ever be raised to these cities for the benefit of the schools. I do not know how that will be. If that is so it would be an argument against the measure, I agree. Whether it is so or not, I do not know. I cannot understand exactly how it can be so, because it is said that the lands which have hitherto been granted, the moment they have passed out of the hands of the Government, as a general thing, particularly in the case of the railroad grants, (and I believe the honorable Senator from Iowa seemed to argue that it had the same effect if you granted the lands for schools,) have been increased in value twofold. If that is so, or if the result is anything in that proportion, we ought to expect a very large return.

Then it is said by the Senator from Kansas that this bill ought not to pass, because it will be peculiarly oppressive to his State, and he assumes that it would be practicable to locate forty miles square in one body, for speculators to cover that quantity of land with this scrip and hold it until the growth of settlement had made it immensely valuable, and keep his children and the children of his constituents from the enjoyment of their rights. All that must be on the supposition that he and his children and the children of his constituents own all the land in Kansas, which we do not agree to. The children of the District of Columbia own it as much as he and his constituents, precisely; and that has nothing to do with the proposition, provided we think it is a reasonable one.

Then I do not understand how that is practicable, and it has no influence upon my mind for this reason: we have been doing this thing repeatedly. This is not novel, it is not new. As I understand, you granted to colleges for agricultural purposes land scrip precisely in the same way. This bill is patterned on that; I do not know that it is a transcript of it, but it follows the same principle precisely. That is a precedent for it, so that I cannot understand that there is any practical difficulty about it. The honorable Senator from Indiana, who may be supposed to know something about the West and western lands, and the Committee on Public Lands say that in form there is no difficulty about this.

Now, I should like to know how it turns out that the moment a bill appropriating only a million acres for the benefit of schools here comes to have the united opposition of persons who claim to own the public lands, who claim to understand most about the policy of the public lands. I have had occasion to look at the question of the public lands somewhat, to see how they have been distributed. I know the argument of my honorable friend from Iowa; it is, that every acre of land you have given to the western States for schools, for railroads, canals, wagon roads, as swamp lands, and what not, has all redounded to the great glory and benefit of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I can answer the question that the Senator from Maine has put. He asks how it happens that there is a united sentiment here on the part of the Senators from the Northwest when there is an application made to vote any public lands away. I think his own experience will furnish a sufficient answer to that, when I ask him how it happens that whenever there is a proposition here to repeal the fishing bounties, by which this Government has paid $25,000,000 during the last sixty years, we have a united front against the passage of that bill from New England.

Mr. MORRILL. That helps me so far on in my argument. [Laughter.] That is our interest; that is our industry; these public lands belong to the West. [Laughter.] Touch them when you will, where you will, for any purpose, and the West says, "Hands off, that is ours." On a former occasion I tried to justify my interest, our great industry, by showing that outside of the local concern it had a grand national aspect; but this is not put upon any such ground as that. We are taking a million acres away from the wagon roads, canals, railroads, &c., of the West!

Now, I insist upon it that unless this can be met on some principle, the opposition is not exactly fair. This is the first grant I have ever known attempted to be taken from the West and appropriated, not to the West, not to the States, but to this place which is needy enough, Heaven knows. It is said this grant will cover over forty miles square. I have not computed it. What has this Government devoted to the interests of popular education in the western States chiefly, not the Northwest? Over fifty-four million acres, fifty times forty miles square. More than two thousand miles square the Government has devoted for the interest of popular education, and I glory in it. It is a grand policy for which I have never failed to vote, and think it was well bestowed, worthily bestowed. The same principle that authorized this Government to do that justifies this and demands it.

Then again for the public improvement, the general welfare, you vote your lands for roads of all descriptions—wagon roads, railroads, and all variety of enterprises. Nobody has ever heard me grudge it or doubt the policy of doing it. Sometimes I have thought they were a little extravagant; when I have seen the tables covered here day after day with all sorts of projects, I have thought that the Government was pretty munificent, to say the least of it. Why, sir, what has this Government done for the railroads, counting out the great enterprise to which there is no end, the end of which no mortal man can see both in money and lands—I mean the road across the continent? Independent of that, we have voted for the enjoyment of States in the West over sixty-six million acres. And now, when we want only a million to educate the poor people in this District, we are met with this objection.

Besides that, not running on a line with this policy by any means, the legislation of the country shows that over sixty million acres of lands have been received by the land States as swamp lands, and an amount in addition to that claimed running up now as the Land Office shows to over seventy-four millions claimed by them as swamp lands; and you would have to sink an artesian well to find water on a good many of them. [Laughter.] The best lands in those States have been covered over under that policy, and the States have enjoyed them; and when the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in his great solicitude to promote public education, comes in here and only asks a million acres, the Senator from Kansas rises and tries to make us believe that somebody will be oppressed if we do so.

I submit, Mr. President, that there is no apprehension of any danger of that description; and I submit that the precedents are ample to justify this. The precedent of giving lands to the agricultural colleges is exactly on a line with this. I take no interest in the matter except that I happen to be associated in some sense with the interests of this district which I know to be needy, needy above any community with which I am acquainted in the northern portion of this country, needing education and needing the encouragement of education more than any community I know. I hope the Senate of the United States, out of its great abundance, considering its liberality in the directions to which I have already referred, will feel that it is not a very extraordinary thing, to say the least of it, to make this grant.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Neither my children nor the children of Kansas claim to own the public lands of that State, but we have to travel the roads of Kansas, and such a grant as this prevents the construction of roads. We want to educate those children in our State. Such a grant as this prevents the education of the children of the State. Upon us devolves the duty of developing the State of Kansas and of settling it up. We protest against any action of this body that prevents the settlement of these new States, and we notify the Senate that such action as this will have that effect. The Senator speaks of large grants to new States. There is not one of them, except the swamp-land grant, that had not for its object the settling up of the States, the inviting of immigration. Every railroad has that effect. So far as Kansas is concerned, and I believe so far as Minnesota is concerned, we have never had and do not expect to ask for any swamp-land grant. We have had no grant except for objects inviting immigration, settling up the country, developing it, in which the State that the Senator from Maine represents is as much interested as we are.

I rose before the Senator from Maine to move a recommitment of this bill. I would like to have the opportunity of going before the committee and urging the objections there that my constituents have to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas make a motion to recommit?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I did propose and expect to make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is in order, if made.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I make it.

Mr. GRIMES. A single word. The statistics furnished to us by the Senator from Maine are exceedingly interesting. I know he has been spending a long time in gathering them up. I have no doubt they are very accurate. I have no doubt he has stated to us precisely the number of acres that have been given to the various western States since the foundation of the Government for educational purposes. But I ask him to remember and the Senate to remember that the system of granting those lands was inaugurated by the Government and established before a single white man went upon them. They were not given for the benefit of the white men, or through any instrumentality of the white men after they occupied the land, but the system was created by his progenitors and the progenitors of the rest of us who emigrated from the East, for the purpose of inducing other men, their neighbors, to go and occupy these lands.

The Senator says that he has been appalled at the number of propositions that have been made here to grant lands for wagon roads, railroads, &c. I think he will bear me witness that I have voted against as many of them and have been as urgent against them as any one in this body. I have opposed nearly all of them, and I think it is exceeding bad policy for the Government to grant so large a portion of them. I want these lands saved for the purpose of enabling his constituents and mine to go upon them and occupy them as bona fide settlers. That is what the Government ought to use them for, because I can assure you, Mr. President, that nearly all the grants of land that are made to railroad and wagon roads (and let me assure the Senator from Massachusetts that that will be the result with his scrip) find their way into the hands of rich capitalists, and in eighteen months or two years after this grant is made the scrip will be held by the wealthy men of the country, and the tendency will be to exclude settlers.

Let me say further, Mr. President, what I believe I said when I was up before, that I am not speaking for the benefit of my State. There is not a foot of public land that I know of now in the State of Iowa. If there are any they are lands that nobody would occupy. But we have had experience in that State. We have had just such experience as I think you are now preparing for some of these other western States; and I do not want to see them put through the same process.

Now, I say again to the Senator from Massachusetts, I have not any conscientious scruples about voting money out of the Treasury to assist schools in the District of Columbia. Let him present a bill, and I will vote for it. Whenever he or the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia represent to me that the interests of this city require that we should vote money for the purpose of establishing or continuing a school already established, I will vote for it most cheerfully.

I oppose this bill because of the bad results that I think will flow from the establishment of this principle and from the issue of this scrip—results not to be experienced by the constituents of the Senator, but to be experienced by the constituents of the Senator from Minnesota and other western States and Territories. I object to the inauguration of this principle for that reason.

The Senator from Maine says that this principle is sustained by innumerable precedents. What are the precedents? He quotes one, and that is the agricultural college bill, and none other so far as I know, except the single case which I cited before where a grant of land of one township was made over forty years ago to the State of Kentucky for the purpose of supporting a deaf and dumb asylum, I think, that land being in the State of Florida, and it was a subject of controversy between the States of Kentucky and Florida up to the time that the secession movement was made five years ago. The precedent in the case of the agricultural college bill I do not think is worthy of being followed. If we are going to do this this year, it has got to be followed in the future. It will be applied to other portions of the country than the District of Columbia, and nobody can tell where it is likely to end. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Kansas will prevail, and that this bill will be recommitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to take up for concurrence the House amendments to Senate joint resolution No. 20.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad.

The first amendment was to insert at the end of line ten the words "due by reason of the completion of said section of twenty miles," so as to read, "said company shall be entitled to its lands due by reason of the completion of said section of twenty miles."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in line seventeen to change the word "sections" to "section."

The amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 7, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOWEN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SCHOONER WAVERTREE.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize a register to be issued for the schooner Wavertree, of Cleveland, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas in alternate sections to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a bill to subject Indian lands and allotted lands in Kansas to the laws thereof; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RESOLUTIONS OF KANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, submitted concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas concerning the United States circuit and district courts; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, concurrent resolutions of the same Legislature asking for the extension of the survey of public lands to the one hundredth meridian of longitude; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SOSCOL RANCH.

Mr. ECKLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers on the Soscol ranch, in the State of California;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask the consent of the House to have a bill reported and put upon its passage at the present time. I will ask to have the bill read. I think there will be no objection to it. It is a matter of considerable importance demanding immediate action.

Mr. MORRILL. I must ask the gentleman to withhold it until we act on the bill which was pending last evening. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the consideration of bill of the House No. 201, to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. The first part of this bill is intended to reach all the stockholders of certain corporations who are taxed by the internal revenue law, whether they are citizens, residents, or aliens. By a decision of the circuit court of Maryland it has been held that a certain section of the internal revenue law, intended to apply to the income tax, applied to the taxes which are collected from corporations, and therefore aliens escaped. The first part of the bill is intended to remedy that defect.

The latter part of the bill is intended merely to apply to returns that have been heretofore made in some instances by parties in coin, the taxes upon which have been paid in paper. I take it there is no objection to the bill. It meets the approbation of the Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the gentleman if this bill changes the existing law in regard to scrip dividends.

Mr. MORRILL. It simply provides that the law which applies to citizens who are stockholders shall apply to aliens also. It authorizes the corporation to deduct the tax from the dividends of the parties who own the stock, whoever they may be. That is done now in relation to our own citizens and to our citizens who reside abroad. By a decision of the courts of Maryland it is held, that in the case of foreigners the corporation cannot deduct the tax, and yet they have to pay it to the Government.

The bill was read. The first section provides—

That in section one hundred and twenty of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, the words "all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, and whenever the same shall be payable to stockholders, policy holders, or depositors," are hereby declared to mean all dividends in scrip or money whenever payable, and all stockholders, policy holders, depositors, or parties whatsoever, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens.

The second section provides—

That in section one hundred and twenty-two of said act the word "stockholders" is hereby declared to mean all persons or parties whatsoever that are or may be stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens; and the words "all such interest or coupons, dividends, or profits, whenever the same shall be payable," are hereby declared to apply to all such interest or coupons, dividends, or profits, whenever the same are or may be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same are or may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens.

It is provided by the third section—

That it shall be the duty of all persons required to make returns or lists of income and articles or objects charged with any duty or tax, as provided by the act aforesaid, or any act amendatory thereof, to declare in such returns whether the several rates and amounts therein continued are stated according to their values in legal-tender currency; and in case of neglect or refusal so to state, to the satisfaction of the assistant assessor or receiving such returns or lists, such assistant assessor is hereby required to make returns or lists for such persons neglecting or refusing, as in case of persons neglecting or refusing to make the lists or returns required by the acts aforesaid, and to assess the duty thereon, and to add thereto the amount of penalties imposed by law in case of such neglect or refusal.

The fourth section provides—

That whenever the rates and amounts contained in the lists or returns as aforesaid shall be stated in coined money, it shall be the duty of each assessor receiving the same to reduce such rates and amounts to their equivalent in legal-tender currency, according to the value of such coined money in said currency at the time and place where said lists or returns are receivable, and which value the said assessor shall determine. And the lists required by law to be furnished to collectors by assessors shall in all cases contain the several amounts of taxes or duties assessed, estimated, or valued in legal-tender currency only.

Section five declares—

That the provisions of this act shall, so far as necessary, apply to all returns, lists, assessments, and collections required by the acts aforesaid in addition to those above mentioned, by whomsoever made, returned, assessed, or collected, in any mode, or for any purpose whatever. And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. This bill declares that the words "all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever the same shall be payable," shall apply to all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever the same are or may be payable. Now, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee [Mr. MORRILL] whether in the case of a declaration of interest due to these stockholders, but not paid, it would be covered under this declaration of meaning, although payable at some indefinite or definite future day. In other words, if these corporations attempt to evade this tax by postponing the payment of the dividends to some future time, would they be reached by this declaration of meaning?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think that this bill changes the existing law in that respect. So far as dividends are concerned, the surplus profits must be reported and taxed each year. This bill quotes the present law and reenacts it so as to apply it to our own people and aliens alike. That is the whole extent of this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I fear it will then mislead us into another difficulty, that the law may be construed to mean that these corporations can only be taxed at the time the dividends are payable, and that if they merely issue certificates of claims to be paid in the future they will not be taxed.

Mr. MORRILL. The original law enforces all such interest or responsibility whenever the same is or may be payable. And that portion of the law is incorporated in this bill in precisely the same language.

Mr. KASSON. I always desire to follow the recommendation of the committee, and shall not vote against this bill, although I think there may be some difficulty under it.

I desire now to call the attention of the gentleman to what I suppose to be the omission of a word in one of these sections. Section four, as printed, reads:

That whenever the rates and amounts contained in the lists or returns as aforesaid shall be stated in coined money, it shall be the duty of each assessor receiving the same to reduce such rates and amounts to their equivalent in legal-tender currency, according to the value of such coined money in said currency at the time and place where said lists or returns are receivable, and which value the said assessor shall determine. And the lists required by law to be furnished to collectors by assessors shall in all cases contain the several amounts of taxes or duties assessed, estimated, or valued in legal-tender currency only.

I think the word "when" has been omitted after the word "time," in the clause "value of such coined money in said currency at the time and place where said lists or returns are receivable," &c.

Mr. MORRILL. I will move to amend the section by inserting the word "when" after the word "time."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL called the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Thursday, the 15th instant, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in regard to certain income taxes collected from the estates of deceased persons who died previous to December 31, 1863, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 29, 1866; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

QUARANTINE IN NEW YORK.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rarely ask the attention of the House to anything out of the regular order of business; but I have a matter in charge from the Committee on Commerce which is of a strictly public character, and which is somewhat urgent. The committee have directed me to ask the consent of the House for its consideration at this time. I refer to a bill which was introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] and referred to the Committee on Commerce, in relation to authorizing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to place certain hulks and vessels at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine, and other proper authorities at ports of the United States, in anticipation of the cholera.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does it not require unanimous consent to consider this bill at this time?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to it at this time.

APPOINTMENT OF REAR ADMIRALS, ETC.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs House bill No. 163, to further regulate the appointment of rear admirals, and for the appointment of certain volunteer officers to the regular Navy, and moved: that the same be printed and recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

INDEX OF EXECUTIVE DOCUMENTS.

Mr. LATHAM reported, from the Committee on Printing, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby directed, to prepare a digested index of the executive documents and reports of committees of the House of Representatives from 1839 to the close of the present Congress, to correspond with the index of the same documents from the commencement of the Government to the close of the Twenty-Fourth Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has reported this resolution whether any estimate has been made of the cost of printing this index.

Mr. LATHAM. The committee have not taken into consideration the printing of the index, as that matter was not referred to them by the resolution, which was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] The index will not be prepared until after the close of the present Congress; and when it shall have been prepared, an estimate of the cost of printing must then be made before it can be printed. The committee can then take into consideration the number to be printed as well as the expense, which was not a matter before the committee at this time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If this resolution should be adopted, it will involve the printing of the work which is to be prepared by the Clerk. I would like to know from the committee, as they have of course made an estimate, how much it will cost to print this index after it shall have been prepared.

Mr. LATHAM. The resolution reported by the committee does not involve the printing of the document at all.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Speaker, if this index is not to be printed, what is the object of having it prepared? Of what use will the mere manuscript copy be?

Mr. BANKS. With the consent of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. LATHAM,] I will state my object in the introduction of this resolution.

A great many reports of great importance to the country, and embodying a vast deal of learning, are now hidden away in the Library of the House, so that there is no possible reference to them unless members take the trouble of going through the volumes one by one. Hence I introduced this resolution, proposing that the Clerk of the House be directed to make an index of these reports. I do not want this index printed at all. The cost of the preparation of this index will be inconsiderable; it probably cannot exceed fifty dollars. The object is to have an index prepared in manuscript, and deposited in the Library of the House of Representatives, so that members can ascertain what is contained in the various reports.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the resolution provides simply for what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] states, I have no objection to it.

Mr. BANKS. It contemplates nothing more than that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does it provide for that alone in explicit terms?

Mr. BANKS. It does not provide for the printing of the index; it simply provides for the compilation of an index.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does it provide for a manuscript index to be deposited in the Library of the House? I would like to have the resolution again read.

Mr. BANKS. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that there is scarcely anything which would be more important and useful to the House than the work provided for by this resolution. The cost of its preparation will be comparatively nothing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the resolution so that it shall provide the manuscript shall be deposited in the Library, and shall not be ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I suggest the gentleman from Illinois shall amend so as to provide for a limitation of the expense; provided it shall not exceed more than $5,000.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides that the index shall be in the custody of the Clerk of the House; and there is where it ought to be. There is an index from the commencement of the Government up to 1839, and this proposes simply to complete that index up to the present time. I hope that the resolution will not be amended.

Mr. LATHAM. I will state further in reference to the amendment, that the index cannot be printed under this resolution, and that after the manuscript has been prepared it will require further action of the House in order to have it printed.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, modified his amendment so as to provide that the manuscript shall be deposited in the Clerk's office of the House of Representatives.

The House divided on the amendment, and there were—ayes 25, noes 67.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to see whether we are to leave this entering wedge for the expenditure of thousands of dollars.

The House divided; and there were—ayes nineteen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURNE of Illinois, and LATHAM, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes nineteen; not one fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 7.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

Mr. SPALDING demanded a division on the adoption of the resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 16.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LATHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand the credentials of six Representatives in Congress from Alabama. I suppose they must go to the tomb of the Capulets. [Laughter.]

MEMBERS on the Republican side. Yes, yes, that is it.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House they will be referred, without debate, to the joint committee on reconstruction.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, while I am up, permit me to ask a question in reference to my duty on another subject. I hold in my hand the petition of a large number of women who, for my gallantry the other day, are favoring me with a considerable number of petitions claiming the right to vote; and on looking over the list of the committees of the House, I can find no committee to which I should refer that petition. I have thought of the Committee of Claims, but I do not know whether the chairman of that committee would be sufficiently gallant to give so important a petition its proper consideration. I have thought of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which refers to mails, and might also be supposed to take an interest in females. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be referred to a committee of old bachelors.

Mr. BROOKS. I next thought of the Committee on the Judiciary; but I thought my honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] with whom I once served, would not have gallantry enough to give it attention. I therefore ask the advice of the House as to where this new subject, not recognized by the rules, shall be referred.

Mr. STEVENS. Let it go to a special committee, so that we may have a report on it.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. I suppose the committee on reconstruction, which is absorbing everything, and which has just absorbed the credentials of the Representatives from Alabama, will have to take into consideration the claim of fifteen million women to the right to vote. I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to refer it to the Committee of Elections, where the gentleman may have an opportunity to advocate it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I am now serving every day on that committee, and I do not like it.

Mr. Brooks's motion was disagreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to say that this morning I sent to the Clerk of the House a similar petition to that referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] I ask therefore that it may be referred to the same committee.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the Senate (No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay, on the 5th of August, 1864; when the Speaker signed the same.

COMMUNICATION FROM SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked leave to take up from the table a communication from the Secretary of War, which was laid on the table yesterday and ordered to be printed, and to have the same referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made, the communication was so referred.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Public Lands.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 85, for the disposal of the public lands for homesteads to actual settlers in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and asked its present consideration.

The Clerk read the bill. It provides that all the public lands in the States aforesaid shall be disposed of according to the stipulations of the homestead law of 1862, no entry to be made for more than eighty acres; provided that no discrimination shall be made on account of race or color, and that mineral lands shall be reserved.

Mr. TABER. As one of the members of that committee, I do not assent to this majority report, and I desire at the proper time to offer an amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I am willing that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] should have an opportunity to submit his amendment to this bill if he desires it.

Mr. TABER. I offer the following amendment:

And provided also, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to preclude such persons as have been or shall be pardoned by the President of the United States for their participation in the recent rebellion from the benefit of this act.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] what there is in the bill which gives rise to the necessity of the amendment he has offered.

Mr. TABER. By the provisions of the homestead law all persons that are not able to take an oath that they have at no time taken part against the Government in the rebellion have no right to participate in the benefits of the homestead act. The consequence is that all those who have served in the rebel army, no matter whether voluntarily or otherwise, are precluded from the benefit of the act. My amendment proposes that those who have been pardoned, and those that may be pardoned, may be permitted to enter upon those lands, the same as others.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask to have read a communication from the Department of the Interior as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
February 5, 1866.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 3d instant, requesting a statement of the number of acres of public land remaining unsold in the five land States of the South, and my views briefly as to the policy and necessity of restricting the disposal of the public lands in said States to actual settlers, under the homestead law of 1862, considering the existing circumstances of the country.

The quantity of surveyed unsold public land in the States referred to is, in Arkansas	9,298,012.70

Alabama	6,732,058.08
Florida	19,379,635.61
Louisiana	6,238,102.15
Mississippi	4,760,736.03
Total	46,398,544.87

The following tables, from the census returns of 1860, exhibit the population in each of said States, the number of square miles, the population to the square mile, the number of farms, acres improved and unimproved, average size of farms, the area in acres for each State, and the aggregate for the five States:

States.	Whites.	Free colored.	Slaves.	Civilized Indians.	Total.	No. square miles.	Population to square mile.
Alabama	536,271	2,690	435,080	160	964,201	50,722	18.9
Florida	77,747	322	81,745	10	140,424	50,268	2.8
Mississippi	383,809	773	438,031	172	791,305	47,136	16.7
Louisiana	387,486	13,647	387,226	172	768,002	41,316	17.1
Total	1,639,516	23,186	1,376,297	383	3,039,382	220,690	12.1

From which it will be seen that there are in the five States 160,888 farms, covering an area of 56,736,739 acres, only 16,796,113 of which are improved, leaving not included in farms and unimproved..... 103,704,861

From which deduct surveyed public land..... 46,398,544
Estimated unsurveyed public land..... 5,000,000
51,398,544

And we have..... 52,306,317

acres held by the several States and corporations under public grants and by individuals not engaged in agricultural pursuits, yet forming a part of the land monopoly in those States.

It is not possible from any data at hand to state with certainty the number of landholders within the States in question, but excluding town, city, and suburban property, it is believed the whole number will not exceed two hundred thousand in a population of more than three millions. Suppose these as heads of families or otherwise, to each represent five persons, and we have one million persons who may by operation of law become holders of real estate, and who have a present or prospective interest in the same, leaving two million thirty-nine thousand three hundred and eighty-two or more than two thirds of the population, landless; and this, too, in a strictly agricultural region, only one tenth of which is improved.

Is it not clear from these facts that to the extent to which it may be legally done the Government should promptly put a stop to further land monopoly in those States? In my judgment, such action is demanded by the best interests, not only of the non-landholders, but of all the people of those States and of the nation.

It may be said that the circumstances which have heretofore tended to land monopoly in those States, have so changed that no further danger of it exists.

It is admitted that the institution of slavery, now abolished, prompted land monopoly. But it is contended that the high price of the products of those States which does, and for some time to come must, prevail, is not less an inducement to such monopoly than was the institution of slavery. This, acting upon the whole capital and enterprise of the country, cannot fail to produce greater results in the direction of monopoly than did the institution of slavery acting only upon a section, and that the least enterprising one.

Besides, the knowledge that these valuable lands are now nearly all in private hands; that but fifty million acres remain at the low Government maximum price, and that the purchase perhaps of one half of this quantity, selecting the most desirable, would complete this gigantic monopoly, are inducements which will hardly be resisted.

Immediately upon the opening of the United States land offices in those States the public land will become subject to location with all the various kinds of Government scrip and warrants, much of which can now be purchased at from sixty to seventy cents per acre, and it is known that combinations of capital already exist for operations in this direction. That some of these would carry business and enterprise with them is no doubt true, but many, and the largest portion, would not. In either event the two million non-landholders in those States must so remain, or seek new homes in the distant States or Territories. The simple question is, do you prefer many or few landed proprietors in the section of country under consideration? If the former, sell under the homestead only. If the latter, no action is necessary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. M. EDMUNDS, Commissioner.

Hon. G. W. JULIAN,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEVENS. Who wrote that letter?
The SPEAKER. The Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. STEVENS. Who is he?
The SPEAKER. J. M. Edmunds.

Mr. STEVENS. God help him! [Laughter.]

Mr. TABER. I move now that the bill as amended be printed, and laid before the House. It is a very important matter. There is a large amount of land to be disposed of, and the provisions of the bill ought to be thoroughly understood before it is acted upon. I move that the consideration of the bill be postponed, and that the bill be printed.

Mr. JULIAN. I hope a different course will be pursued. I yielded to the gentleman for the purpose of offering his amendment. I cannot yield for a motion to postpone.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to amend as follows: in line twelve, after the word "acres," insert "and in lieu of the sum of ten dollars required to be paid by the second section of said act there shall be paid the sum of five dollars at the time of the issue of each patent."

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this time. The motion of the gentleman from New York was to amend by adding to the bill a proviso at the end.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] will accept it, so that I can make my amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I accept it, if there is no objection.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.
Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will withdraw it, then, and offer it at another time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only arrive at his object by offering it as a substitute.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will withdraw it, and offer it again after the pending amendment is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is moved on the bill and the pending amendments, the gentleman may not have an opportunity to offer it, because the previous question will not exhaust itself until the third reading of the bill. If the gentleman from Indiana moves the previous question only on the pending amendment, there will be an opportunity for the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I understand the Speaker to say that I can offer a substitute for the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can offer a substitute embracing all the original bill and what he proposes to add to it.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I offer that substitute.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, that I may state the reasons why I think this bill ought to be recommitment and printed together with the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. JULIAN. I must decline to do so. I prefer to submit what I have to say, and then I will yield for any questions. The bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands proposes to extend the homestead law of 1862 over the five land States specified in the bill. Those States contain of surveyed public lands which have been offered for sale forty-six million acres. The proposition is simply to extend the homestead law over the whole of that immense domain, and to that, I take it, no objection will be urged from any quarter in this House. If we had adopted an extensive system of confiscation the necessity of this bill would have been less. As it is, homesteads are imperatively demanded both by the poor whites and the poor blacks of the South who have heretofore constituted the background of the institution of slavery, now abolished, creating a necessity for new openings for homesteads in that region and a wider field for free labor.

Mr. PLANTS. I will inquire of the gentleman from Indiana if this bill will not interfere with the operation of the freedmen's bill which we have just passed? Will it not come in conflict with that?

Mr. JULIAN. This bill is entirely consistent with that bill, and supplementary to it. It certainly does not abridge any right proposed to be conferred by the freedmen's bill.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman to what bill he refers, which he says this bill is supplementary to?

Mr. JULIAN. I said that this bill will be in aid of the freedmen's bill, and not in conflict with it.

Mr. CHANLER. What bill is it supplementary to?

Mr. JULIAN. If it changes the freedmen's bill at all it will be a change in the nature of a supplement, extending the rights conferred by the freedmen's bill, and not abridging them.

Mr. CHANLER. I understand the gentleman to say that this bill was supplementary to the freedmen's bill.

Mr. JULIAN. It is supplementary to the homestead bill, and extends the provisions of that bill over the five States specified in it.

The bill further provides that the quantity of land selected by any one person shall be eighty acres, and not one hundred and sixty acres, as provided in the homestead bill of 1862. The necessity of this modification of the homestead law in that region arises from the fact already stated: the increased necessity for homesteads in that section of country caused by the abolition of slavery and the demands of free labor. It is deemed, in view of the number who seek homes there and need them, that eighty acres will be an adequate amount in lieu of one hundred and sixty, as provided in the homestead bill.

The bill further provides that the sale of the public lands in all of these five States shall henceforth cease; that the whole of this domain shall be subjected to actual settlement under the provisions of the homestead law. As a matter of course this cuts off land speculation in the whole of that country. Without some provision of this kind, rebel speculators now hovering over the whole of that region and hunting up the best portions of it, and the holders of agricultural college scrip, who can take about eight or nine million acres of that land, and perhaps the whole of the best portion of it, can come down upon it at one swoop and cheat the actual settler, whether black or white, out of his rights, or even the possibility of a home to come in that region, driving the whole of them to some of our western Territories or to starvation itself.

According to the facts communicated by the Commissioner of the Land Office, there are only two hundred thousand landholders in the whole of that region, in a total population of over three millions. In other words, only one man in fifteen, or one fifteenth of the whole people of this exclusively agricultural region, are landholders. Thus two million eight hundred thousand out of the three millions are non-landholders, a phenomenon which certainly ought not to exist, or which, if allowed to exist, should not be extended. If you count every landholder as a head of a family, and the number of each family as five, there will still be only one million of persons in all that region who have any possibility of becoming landholders; and even upon that estimate there will still be more than two million landless people, out of three million population, in an exclusively agricultural community, and in a region of which only one tenth is cultivated or improved land. That is a very remarkable and a very startling condition of affairs in that region of country. It is a condition of things which pleads imperatively for some policy which shall dedicate the whole of these forty-six million acres remaining unsold to actual occupancy and improvement under the homestead law. I need not dwell upon that further, for the point is too clear to require elucidation.

This bill further provides that the benefits of it shall be opened to all persons in the South without discrimination on account of race or color. That is undoubtedly the law already. But we have thought it wise to put in this bill an express stipulation that these benefits shall be open to men of color; and I wish to take this occasion to advertise as far as I may the fact that should this bill pass, all men will have the benefit of its provisions. It is the fact, unfortunately, that the great body of the colored people of this country, North and South, are to-day ignorant of the fact that a black man is legally a citizen of the United States. In consequence of the Dred Scott decision, and the power of latter-day Democracy in debauching the public sentiment of the country, it is not generally understood that black men have any rights in relation to the public domain of the country. We say, by the express provisions of this bill, that colored men shall have those rights, and we say so for the enlightenment of white people as well as black. I believe it is now unknown to multitudes of white men, even in the northern States, that colored men have any rights under the homestead law. We ought to make that fact known to black and white, so that the multitudes of landless people may understand what are their rights of acquiring homesteads.

I suppose that the provisions of this bill are now fully understood, and therefore, before I sit down, I propose to call the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TABER.] I wish to state, however, before doing so, that if his amendment is a desirable one it would be more appropriate as an amendment to the general homestead law than as an amendment to this particular bill. I submit to the gentleman that some proposition proposing a change of the homestead law will accomplish his object more thoroughly than he can do by an amendment to this bill, and I hope, as an amendment to this bill, it will be voted down.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments before he calls the previous question?

Mr. JULIAN. I will do so.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope this House will not at this time act conclusively upon this bill, for the reason that it contains some provisions that, in my judgment, are not compatible with the best interests of the Government. I believe that this bill ought to be recommitted to the committee, and the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office printed, in order that the members of this House may understand the real point that is involved in the bill now pending. I see, by the report which the chairman of the committee [Mr. JULIAN] sent to the Clerk's desk and had read for the information of this House, there is embraced the identical idea of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TABER,] as contained in the amendment which he has offered. It is, that all those who have been engaged in the rebellion, whether they went into it voluntarily or were forced into it by surrounding circumstances, and have been pardoned by the President, shall not be excluded from this bill.

By reference to the second section of the act to which this is supplementary, it will be seen that it is provided that none of those who have been engaged in the rebellion shall enter any land whatever. Now, I am opposed in that way, or in any other, to exclude any portion of the American people, especially after the pardon of the Executive has been extended to them. And I hope that this bill will be recommitted, and that the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office will be printed, in order that we may fully understand the bearings of this bill.

I do not believe in the policy of persecuting these persons. In the language of the Commissioner, these individuals must live in our midst. Many of them have families; and they must maintain themselves or become dependent upon public charity for support. Now, sir, is it good policy on the part of the Government to exclude this class of individuals from obtaining a homestead when the result of such exclusion must be to make them paupers? I say that such a policy is bad, and ought not to be tolerated.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor, but yielded to

Mr. RICE, of Maine, who said: Mr. Speaker, as I had the honor to introduce this bill and move its reference to the committee, and as they have reported it back substantially as it was referred to them, I ask the attention of the House while I present some considerations in support of the measure.

Sir, in order to secure liberty and right and justice throughout these southern States which have been in rebellion, we must penetrate to the fundamental difficulties existing there—difficulties growing out of the abnormal condition of those States before they went into rebellion—one of which was the immense land monopolies which had grown up there for the support of slavery and oppression. Sir, it is impossible for us to give liberty, protection, and justice to the people of those States, unless we secure them in their homes and their homesteads.

The bill now before us will, in my judgment, accomplish this, and is therefore of great practical importance in its bearing upon these States, and upon the laboring masses of the people therein. What does it do? It lays its strong hand upon forty-six million nine hundred thousand acres of lands in five of these States, and in its iron grasp holds them forever from the rapacious talons of the monopolist and the speculator, and then distributes them in small parcels, under the beneficent provisions of the homestead law, to the oppressed, wronged, and suffering poor. It says to five hundred and eighty-six thousand two hundred and fifty of the landless, homeless, but loyal people of the South, stand up in the pride and independence of liberty and manhood. Gather around you your wives and your children, and build for yourselves and for them homes and homesteads—nurseries of independence, citadels of liberty—under the sunny skies of your native South. There, under the protection of this law, laboring in your own fields, living in your own houses, intrenched in your own castles, instructing your children in your own schools, and worshipping God in your own churches, you can demand and extort from your enemies justice and equality of civil rights before the laws.

This law is a notice to the ex-slaveholders of the South that each homestead erected under it is a "city of refuge" for the starving laborers, black and white, fleeing from the wrongs and extortions directed against them. With free lands to occupy and cultivate and own, no combinations of capital, no monopolies, no vagrant laws, nor all these combined, can make slaves of the laboring masses in any country. Where ever and whenever they can have homes and lands of their own, even if they be in the mountains and amid the swamps, there human nature and human manhood will assert its prerogatives and its freedom.

It has been said that liberty dwells in the mountains. Why does it dwell there? Because avarice and monopoly have driven men from the plains, where lands are valuable and where selfishness and capital could gather to themselves more of this world's goods; hence the poor and oppressed have been driven to the mountains. Not because they loved them better, but because only there could they enjoy their heart's greatest love, liberty. Sir, liberty is just as indignant to the broad plains of Illinois and Minnesota and other parts of this country as to the mountain districts; and it grows and flourishes there as it does in the mountain regions, because the people are protected in their homes and by their firesides by equal and just laws. Monopolies are discouraged, and the rights of free labor and free men maintained. So it will be all over our beloved land, provided we do our whole duty in the difficult emergency which is now upon us; and that this will be accomplished I have an abiding faith. It is not possible, with the trials and sufferings of the last five years fresh in our memories, with our obligations to the noble soldiers and sailors who have saved the nation pressing upon us, that we can prove recreant to the high trust confided to our keeping. And, sir, with the blessing of God, we shall not, but shall complete the regeneration and redemption of the waste places of the South, and plant liberty and justice there, and protect their growth until they shall reach their full stature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this bill do? It takes 6,700,000 acres of land in Alabama, 7,700,000 acres in Mississippi, 6,200,000 acres in Louisiana, 9,300,000 in Arkansas, and 20,000,000 or thereabouts in Florida, making a grand total of 46,900,000 acres, and under the liberal provisions of the homestead act, that act which shall live as a monument to the wisdom of the Congress that enacted it, and of the martyred patriot who approved it, and gives it all to the poor people of the South, and to others who may go and dwell with them. If the people of the South shall be protected in the homesteads which they shall take up under this bill, then I defy all the accursed enginery of oppression there to drive freedom from that God-favored, but man-accursed land. How many homesteads of eighty acres will this bill give? Five hundred and eighty-six thousand two hundred and fifty. It is a moderate estimate, that each homestead will provide a home and support for five persons each, thus giving homes to 2,931,250. But a portion of the lands may not be suitable for homesteads. If 40,000,000 acres are suitable for cultivation, then we have 500,000 homesteads, supporting 2,500,000 persons. Thirty million acres will give 375,000 homesteads, and at five acres each will support 1,875,000 persons. This last estimate, I believe, from the best information I can obtain, will be easily attainable under the bill, and the homesteads be made from good arable lands. But if oppression and wrong shall drive the people from remunerative labor in other fields and pursuits, this 30,000,000 acres of good land will give support and independence to at least double the number I have estimated, which will be 3,750,000.

Ay, sir, if aristocracy and capital and unjust laws shall do their worst in these States against the freedman and the loyal whites of the South, this bill, if it be enacted, and the rights of the people under it be maintained and protected by the Federal Government, will, of itself, secure to them all the God-given rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Each and every acre of the fertile arable lands of the South will give support and independence to each able-bodied adult person who may own and cultivate it. If we admit that but one half of the landless laboring masses of the South are able-bodied adults, and that they number five millions, and that but twenty million acres of these lands are of good quality, then each adult may have a farm of four acres, which will be ample to support him and his helpless dependents. I doubt not that this last estimate reduces the farms to much smaller dimensions than the facts will warrant, which will make my argument so much the better. And the argument is based upon the supposition that the class of persons who have ruled and oppressed the southern people will continue to do so. But this, thank God, will be impossible, and the passage of this bill will give one of the most steadfast and abiding instrumentalities to prevent it. The laws which we may pass here may be effective to secure the people against wrong and injustice there while backed by the strong arm of Federal power, but no longer. This bill gives to the people the means whereby they may live independent of capitalists and land monopolists, and thus they will be enabled to protect themselves. No man can be made a slave so long as he has the means to support himself, and those whom nature has made dependent upon him. Give him the choice whether to submit to extortion and oppression or to labor on his own land for his own and their support, even if the latter be eked out from the sterile mountain side, and he will accept the latter.

Again, this law and the protection which it will afford will be a better surety that the present land monopolists of the South will do what right and justice require toward their former dependents and slaves than all the laws that can be enacted to accomplish such results. Give freedom and independence to labor, and then the capitalist and the landholder will be forced to respect it. They must have labor, for they will not labor themselves, and they will contract for it and pay for it liberally and justly rather than to starve. Sir, I agree with the honorable gentleman who reported this bill, [Mr. JULIAN,] that the lands of the leading rebels of the South should have been confiscated and given out in homesteads to the loyal men of the South and to our gallant soldiers who, by their prowess, have saved them from the control of the most accursed despotism and aristocracy that can be imagined. More especially should the lands which belonged to the several rebel States have been so confiscated, if they did not inure and revert to the Federal Government by virtue of their conquest. Then, instead of being forced to give these forty-seven million acres for this purpose, we would have more than three times that amount, justly forfeited as the penalty of treason. I believe there are about one hundred million acres now owned or claimed to be owned by rebellious Texas alone, which should in justice be thus distributed. But, sir, we must do justice even if we do not exact it. We must give to the liberty-loving, loyal men of the South the means to live and to preserve their independence in proportion as we are generous and forgiving to the traitors who seek to oppress them. Up to this rule I trust even the gentlemen on the other side of the House may be induced to act.

I have said that we must strike to the very foundation of the difficulties existing in the South. We must educate the people in the rights and duties of freemen. This can be done in no other way than by planting them upon the soil and protecting them there. Why, sir, what is the use of giving liberty and the right of suffrage to men, if you say that they shall not have the right to live and support themselves by honest labor? Unless you grant them this, you give them a stone when they ask you for bread. Wherever there are small farms, there you find liberty and independence. Give the lands of any country into the control and ownership of great monopolies, and there the masses of the people will be oppressed, ignorant, and miserable. The greatest and most difficult problem to solve in this century is a political and social one combined; and that is to protect the poor and the ignorant against the wrongs and oppressions of capital and aristocracy. This is a labor which needs to be done everywhere, in the North as well as in the South, in the East and the West; and most abundantly in the monarchies and oligarchies of the Old World. May its solution be wrought out to its greatest perfection in our own favored country.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is free from the charge of class legislation. It operates upon all alike whether they be white or black. I admit that more of the black race will be able to avail themselves of its provisions than the white race of the South, for the reason that they are mostly loyal, and the whites are mostly disloyal; and the blacks, too, are more anxious to take up farms and labor upon them than the whites. The evidence comes up to us from every source that the great desire of the freedman is to have a small farm for the support of himself and family, and therefore they will speedily avail themselves of the provisions of this bill, and very soon release the Government from all expense on their account. The following is an extract from one of the letters of the commercial correspondent of an association of cotton manufacturers as published in the Nation:

"ORANGEBURG, S. C., September 8, 1865.

"The sole ambition of the freedman at the present time appears to be to become the owner of a little piece of land, there to erect a humble home, and to dwell in peace and security at his own free will and pleasure: if he wishes to cultivate the ground to cotton on his own account, to be able to do so without any one to dictate to him hours or systems of labor; if he wishes instead to plant corn or sorghum or sweet potatoes, to be able to do that free from any outside control, in one word, to be free to control his own time and efforts without anything that can remind him of past sufferings in bondage.

"This is his idea, his desire, and his hope. It is common to all, but much stronger among the married and middle aged."

I also read the following from a southern man, as well illustrating the views which I have have had the honor to submit, and the importance and necessity of this measure:

"GEORGIA, BY A RESIDENT.—The negro's first want is not the ballot, but a chance to live; yes, sir, a chance to live. You say the Government has given him freedom, and that many good men in the North believe he must have the ballot to secure that freedom. I tell you he's not got his freedom yet, and isn't likely to get it right away. Why, he can't even live without the consent of the white man. He has no land—he can make no crops except the white man gives him a chance. He hasn't any timber—he can't get a stick of wood without leave from a white man. We crowd him into the fewest possible employments, and then he can scarcely get work anywhere but in the rice fields and cotton plantations of a white man who has owned him and given up slavery only at the point of the bayonet. Even in this city he can't get a pail of water from a well without asking a white man for the privilege. He can hardly breathe, and he certainly can't live in a house, unless a white man gives his consent. What sort of freedom is that? He has freedom in name, but not in fact. In many respects he is worse off than he was before you made him free, for then the property-interest of his master protected him, and now his master's hand, as well as the hand of everybody else, is against him. True, he has the military force for his protection, but there are a thousand things done here every day under the colonel's very nose that he don't know anything about—things he couldn't remedy if he did know about them. Then, besides, there are hundreds of wrongs of which he knows, that he can't reach and can't make right. 'Isn't such whippings as he told you about that most wrong the negro; it's the small, endless, mean, little injustice of every day that's going to kill him off. He's only partially protected now; take the troops away and his chance wouldn't be as good as a piece of light-wood in a house on fire.

"I have not much faith in the idea that capital and labor will reconcile themselves. Things are exceptional here. Our capital is all in the hands of a few and invested in great plantations. Our labor is all in the hands of a race supremely ignorant, and against whom we all have a strong prejudice. In my opinion, you can't reconcile these two interests unless you put the labor in subjection to the capital; that is, unless you give the white man control of the negro. Of course that can't again be allowed, and therefore there is an almost impassable gulf between the negro and freedom, unless the Government aids him. I will tell you what I think you should have done. The policy of confiscation should be rigidly carried out at once. Mercy to the individual is death to the State; and in pardoning all the leading men, the President is killing the free State he might have built here. The landed aristocracy have always been the curse of the State; I say that, as a man born and reared in Georgia, and bound to her by every possible tie. Till that is broken down there can be no real freedom here for either the negro or the poor white. The result of the war gave you a chance you never will get again to overthrow that monopoly. The negroes and the poor whites are bitter enemies in many respects, but they agree in wanting land. You should have carried out your confiscation policy; divided up the great plantations into fifty-acre lots, and sold them to the highest and best bidders. That would have thrown some of the land into other large plantations, but it would have been fair, and would have given the poor whites and the negroes a chance. Give a man a piece of land; let him have a cabin of his own, upon his own lot, and then you make him free. Civil rights are good for nothing, the ballot is good for nothing, till you make some men of every class landholders. You must give the negroes and poor whites a chance to live; that's the first thing you should do. The negro has a great notion to get him a piece of land, and you should help him along by that notion. What does he want of a vote? He wouldn't know how to use it, and 'twouldn't bring him anything to eat or wear if he had a dozen. Give him land, and then you touch his case exactly. He can get none now. There is not one planter in a thousand who would sell him any; but if you'd carried out your confiscation policy he could have bought it like anybody else."

Mr. Speaker, I fully concur in all this writer has said, unless he be understood as opposing the enfranchisement of the negro. I, sir, contend that he should in justice have this great right. I believe it is the greatest and best power which the poor man can have for his protection against the oppressions of capital.

Give him a homestead and the ballot, and he will soon understand his rights and maintain them. They should go together to be effectual. If we cannot confer but one now, let us give him that, the homestead, and with that he will soon extort and secure the others.

Mr. TABER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me.

Mr. JULIAN. For how long?

Mr. TABER. Five minutes.

Mr. JULIAN. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment, as I understand, conforms to the principle set forth in the letter of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and also, I understand, the principle stated by the gentleman who reported this bill: to wit, there would be great propriety in amending the homestead act. This is a special bill applying to these States, taking the public lands from market and providing that they shall be disposed of in a certain manner. If there is a propriety in establishing the principle of the homestead act, there is a propriety in establishing it at this particular time. It is known there may be difficulty and delay. If the bill be permitted to pass without the amendment, every man who has been forced to serve in the confederate army against his will is precluded from the enjoyment of the benefits of the act. I believe no one will deny, if these men are allowed to come under the homestead law they will be better citizens than if they are allowed to remain as they have been heretofore.

I hope that the further consideration of the bill may be postponed so that the bill, amendment, and report may be ordered to be printed. It is too important a bill to be disposed of so summarily. I hope that the action of the House will yet be that the subject may be thoroughly investigated before it shall be passed upon by the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. JULIAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. I will draw the attention of the House to the fact that this bill is of equal importance to those which have already been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It involves the rights of property. If it is for the purpose of preventing speculation from one section it seems to have the effect of promoting a speculation from another section. The whole object of the people of the United States is, it seems, to get possession of these lands that they may have homesteads, that they may have castles, according to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE,] where they may fight for liberty. The policy of this bill is to perpetuate strife between the races. It is to furnish castles at the expense of the United States, that the negro race may hold these lands at the point of the bayonet against the tide of emigration of white men. That is the object of the bill.

Gentlemen talk about southern rights and the southern people as if they were a foreign people. They exclude all those men who, whatever their acts may have been during the rebellion, still are bound to us by ties stronger than can be broken by any such acts. It excludes minors from the benefit of the homestead act.

This is a subject which requires the full and fair consideration of this House. We should know, not only the policy of the measure, but the results it will have upon the Government. It is colonization, it is establishing a new system of colonization equal to that that the Romans had after the conquest, by which the essential power of an empire was fastened upon the people that they had overthrown by arms.

The bill proposes to surrender a vast quantity of land to a race which the whole history of this country proves stands isolated and alone in all their acts and movements as a body. We may by our conduct show kindness to them, we may protect them, but here it is proposed to collect them in masses, and keep them in tracts as you would the Indian tribes, by setting apart to them whole sections of country where they must live under their own organization as a people. Now, I contend that these people have never shown a capacity for self-government.

Sir, I protest against the centralizing principle of this bill, and I appeal to the gentleman, not for the purpose of delaying action, but to enable him with the eloquence, force, and cogency of argument for which he is so remarkable, to explain this measure so that this House and the country may know that we are not acting in the dark. Let us know whether in letting the negro have these lands the white man is to be excluded. Let us know all about the matter. The bill before us is not printed, and is not therefore in a proper condition to be debated and considered.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has already stated his view of the question, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] has stated his, and now the House is called on to vote without further information and without further discussion. I have no opposition to granting men homesteads, nor do I wish to exclude the black man from the full enjoyment of every privilege God has granted to him. But I do wish that the progress of this Government shall be in the right direction, and shall be honest, open, and impartial. And I look upon this measure as both impartial and unjust. I may be mistaken. If so a fair presentation of the argument on the other side may induce me to withdraw my opposition to this bill, and the House may act unanimously in securing for the black man such a home as his friends assert he is so deserving and so worthy to possess. But until the gentleman allows discussion upon this matter in Committee of the Whole, or until this bill can be fairly examined, I consider it a farce to bring it to a vote.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] I will say a word on this subject. As I understand the object of this bill, it is that none but actual settlers shall have the benefit of the public lands of these States. I have been familiar with the disposition of public lands for nearly thirty years, and can bear testimony to the fact that capital first seizes them. Now, those who in my opinion, have the first right to the occupancy of these lands are actual settlers. But in Illinois they have had to pay on an average ten dollars per acre, because the capitalists have speculated on the public lands. And the capitalists now hold them in vast quantities in the West. I think if the gentleman should extend his observations to the States in the West he would be astonished at the result. I desire to say that I hope the system will be extended to all the public lands.

Mr. JULIAN. I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. TABER. On that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken on the adoption of the amendment, it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 104, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos B. Ashley, Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Chanler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, McCullough, McRuer, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sigourney, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, and Voorhees—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Deaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deftrees, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoo, Mercier, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Culver, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Harris, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Ketcham, Loan, McKee, Morrill, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Stilwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—41.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired during the roll-call, this bill goes over until to-morrow during the morning hour, and the special order now is the consideration of the bankrupt bill, upon which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOGAN. I ask that the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands which we have just been considering be printed. I would like to know what it is.

Mr. JULIAN. The bill has been printed, and is on the files of members.

Mr. HOGAN. I would like to have the bill and the amendments printed. It can be done by to-morrow morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. There is a proviso reported by the committee at the end of the bill which has not been printed. With that exception the bill is printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That will be in the Globe of to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The SPEAKER. The special order in the House is the consideration of the bankrupt bill. It was made the special order to come in immediately after the Freedmen's Bureau bill was disposed of, and to continue from day to day until disposed of. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman from Rhode Island state what is his intention in regard to the disposition of this bill as to time and manner?

Mr. JENCKES. I do not propose to debate the bill. It has been before the House and the country so long that every one understands it. I propose simply to explain some modifications which the committee propose to make in the bill, and then to ask the previous question on its passage, unless some gentleman who is opposed to the principle of the bill wishes to enter into a discussion of it. I have no desire to preclude debate.

EXPENSES OF A JOINT COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to have taken from the Speaker's table a joint resolution from the Senate for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States?

Mr. JENCKES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

BANKRUPT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. CONKLING. If I may now say a word in reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island, I will be glad to say to him that I have some amendments which I would like to offer to this bill, and some suggestions I would like to make; I do not wish to debate it. Other gentlemen, I know, have suggestions of more or less consequence that they would like to make.

The bill comes up quite unexpectedly to me this morning, and I confess that for one I would be very glad to have it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. JENCKES. I shall be glad to hear the suggestions of the gentleman, if I do not lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be the special order to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. JENCKES. I would ask the gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen who have amendments to propose, to submit them. Perhaps we may agree on them without discussion in the House.

Mr. CONKLING. They can be read to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

BURLINGTON AND MISSOURI RIVER RAILROAD.

Joint resolution of the Senate No. 12, extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad, was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that that bill be considered now. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to my colleague that I understand there is a general bill extending the time to all railroads, and I have an amendment that I wish to offer to that bill, that will include this special proposition. I hope my colleague will let this resolution lie over until that bill comes up.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague [Mr. KASSON] is mistaken in relation to the effect of this bill. This bill does not relate to a general extension of time; but it provides that this company shall have its time extended from the 1st of July next until December to complete a section of twenty miles upon which they are now at work, and which they will not be able to complete by the 1st of July next, owing to the difficulties they have met with in bridging the Des Moines river.

Mr. KASSON. If that is all, I have no objection to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is all.

The bill was then read at length. It provides that in case the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company shall complete the section of twenty miles from the present terminus of its road by the 1st of December, 1866, and the certificate of the Governor of Iowa shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior of such completion, the company shall be entitled to its lands, as provided in section eight of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State,'" and its rights shall be in all respects the same as if the same sections should have been completed on the 1st of July next.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask if this does not grant additional advantages in some way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It does not. The only effect of this bill will be to give this railroad company from the 1st of July next until the 1st of December following to complete the section of twenty miles upon which they are now at work.

Mr. STEVENS. If it was stated merely in the bill that the time was so extended, then I could understand it. But it goes further and speaks about giving other sections.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The act to which this is an amendment provides that this railroad company shall be entitled to receive a certain amount of lands for this section of twenty miles whenever the same shall be completed and a proper certificate made thereof. The company have met with delay in the construction of a bridge over the Des Moines river. The high water and the ice this winter have carried away their temporary work; and it is necessary to give them this time, or they will forfeit that amount of land, to which they would be entitled if they complete that section of the road by the 1st of July next.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not object to the extension of time; but I do not like the wording and phraseology of this bill in other respects.

Mr. KASSON. I have the bill in my hands, and I find that it provides that in case the railroad shall complete the section of twenty miles from the present terminus of the road, by the 1st of December next, and the certificates are filed, then the company shall be entitled to these lands as provided in the original bill, in case it should be completed by the 1st of July. The objection may be taken to it, perhaps, that this would constitute a waiver in respect to lands to which it would be entitled by reason of subsequent sections to be completed.

There is another objection to the wording of the last clause. It says, "and its rights shall be in all respects the same as if the same sections should be completed on the 1st of July next." It is intended to apply to the first section, which includes the bridge, and that clause should be amended so as to make it clear.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will move to amend the bill by striking out the word "sections" and insert the word "section."

Mr. KASSON. And I would also suggest that after the word "lands," the words "by reason of the completion of said section" be inserted, so that it will then read, "then the said company shall be entitled to these lands, by reason of the completion of said section, as provided in section eight," &c.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that amendment if my colleague [Mr. KASSON] will offer it. But that is just what the bill means now.

Mr. KASSON. I move that amendment.

Mr. DRIGGS. Why should not this bill take the ordinary course, and go to the Committee on Public Lands? It would seem that the bill is not matured, even in the minds of the gentlemen who are in favor of it. There may be some things in it which want looking into a little. And I hope it will take the usual course.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The bill is understood by those who are in favor of it, and it is understood to mean just exactly what I have stated. The only confusion there is comes from putting in the title of the act of which this is an amendment, and which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] seems to think will cover up something that does not appear upon the face of the bill. But it is necessary, in order to describe the particular law to which this is an amendment, to copy the title.

I now call the previous question on the bill and the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. KASSON.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment offered by Mr. KASSON.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "lands" the words "due by reason of the completion of said section of twenty miles;" so that the clause will read thus:

The said company shall be entitled to its lands, due by reason of the completion of said section of twenty miles, &c.

In the next to the last line strike out the letter "s" in the word "sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The previous question does not exhaust itself till the third reading of the bill. The question now recurs upon ordering the bill as amended to be read a third time.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that in the bill (H. R. No. 201) passed this morning, a bill to declare the meaning of certain parts of the internal revenue act, approved June 30, 1864, and for other purposes, there was an error in the printing of the bill. The word "continued," in the sixth line of the third section, ought to be "contained." If there be no objection the correction will be made in engrossing the bill.

There was no objection.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE TO MRS. LINCOLN.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 86) entitled "An act granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that this bill will be put on its passage now.

The bill, which was read, provides that all letters and packets carried by post to and from Mary Lincoln, widow of the late Abraham Lincoln, shall be conveyed free of postage during her natural life.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 69) entitled "An act to provide for the payment of pensions;" which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CLERKS IN POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 96) entitled "An act authorizing an increase of the clerical force in the Post Office Department;" which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICT IN OREGON.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 30) entitled "An act to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COLLECTION OF SOLDIERS' CLAIMS.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 88) entitled "An act to restrict the expenses of collecting soldiers' claims against the Government;" which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America; which was read a first and second time.

The question recurring on ordering the joint resolution to a third reading.

Mr. LE BLOND called for the reading of the joint resolution, and it was read.

It appropriates $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenses of the joint committee of Congress appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America; which sum is to be drawn from the Treasury upon the order of the Secretary of the Senate, as it shall be required from time to time by the committee having such investigation in charge; and any portion of the sum thus appropriated that shall be allowed by the joint committee to witnesses attending before it, or to persons employed in its service for per diem, traveling, or other necessary expenses, and paid by the Secretary of the Senate in pursuance of the order of the joint committee, is to be credited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question, which was on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will explain the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. All that I can say is that witnesses are daily being examined before the committee on reconstruction in pursuance of the orders of this House.

Mr. ROSS. It is not proposed to deprive the House of the services of members and to let them go down South?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are not to have the same privilege that my colleague had at the last session of traveling over the plains at the expense of the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. I understand that the President of the United States has appointed individuals to make this investigation.

Mr. STEVENS. I have stated what the committee are now doing. Of course I do not know what the committee may hereafter resolve to do.

Mr. ROSS. I regard the resolution as unnecessary in every respect.

Mr. GRIDER. Does he know of any witnesses who have claimed mileage for attending before that committee?

Mr. STEVENS. I can tell the gentleman that the Sergeant-at-Arms has advanced considerable sums of money upon bills approved to pay witnesses.

The previous question was taken on the passage of the joint resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 25, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Davis, DeForest, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Habbell, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKner, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Orin, Paine, Perham, Pike, Platts, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefelt, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Arman, Bert Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Brooks, Chandler, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Strouse, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Voorhees—25.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Conkling, Culver, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Farnsworth, Garfield, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Holmes, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hubbard, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Ladlin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marston, McCullough, McKee, Morrill, Moulton, Newell, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rousseau, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Starr, Taber, Francis Thomas, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Whaley, Winfield, and Wright—55.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Militia, reported back resolutions in regard to the appropriation of certain property in Missouri and Kentucky for the establishment of Soldiers' Homes, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY IN REFERENCE TO CLAIMS.

Mr. SMITH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to perpetuate testimony in cases of claims against the quartermaster's and commissary departments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. At half past four the House, under the order which has been passed, will take a recess for an evening session. The Chair will state that last evening no member was prepared to go on; and if no member is yet prepared the evening session had better be dispensed with.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I understand the gentleman from Oregon is prepared to go on this evening.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 204) entitled "An act to regulate the registry of vessels;" when the Speaker signed the same.

REVENUE FROM REBEL STATES.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the House of Representatives in tabular form the total amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States from all sources since the 1st of April and May, 1865, to this date by the States lately in rebellion.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now demand a vote on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 122, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867.

The CHAIRMAN stated that by order of the House general debate on the bill had been closed, and discussion was now limited to five minutes on amendments.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would inquire whether we are going to have an opportunity to amend the bill in the House. The reason I make the inquiry is, that if the item for the purchase of Seavey's Island, which has been stricken out in committee is sustained in the House, then I wish to move to discontinue the bridge between Seavey's Island and the navy-yard.

Mr. KASSON. This bill consists of but one section, as I suppose, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rice] may, if he chooses, prepare a section for discontinuing that bridge and put it at the end of the bill. It is a new subject and can be put in at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be considered in the House—only in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the provision contained in lines one hundred and twenty-four, one hundred and twenty-five, and one hundred and twenty-six:

For purchase of the right of drainage through the yard, now held by the city of Charlestown, $25,000.

I do it on the ground that I do not know why Congress should be called upon to drain the city of Charlestown.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer the question why the United States should do this. There is now the right on the part of the city of Charlestown to drain the wastage of that city right through the navy-yard. It is obnoxious, in many respects, to the occupants of the yard. It will cost more than $25,000 to the city of Charlestown to make a new drain and relieve the navy-yard from the nuisance. It is proposed by the Navy Department to allow this much ($25,000) to be relieved from the existence of the nuisance. It will be applied by the city of Charlestown for a new drain.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know what claim there is upon the Government of the United States, that owns this property, to permit the city of Charlestown to go through her property. The United States Government owns the navy-yard there, and the city of Charlestown has no right whatever to go through there without the consent of the Government. If we deny that consent, then they must build another drain at their own expense.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is in error. It is an easement.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the provision in regard to drainage; and there were—yeas 34, nays 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers, and they were ordered.

The House divided; and the tellers reported yeas fifty-eight, nays not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the item contained in lines one hundred and thirty-five and one hundred and thirty-six:

For building for offices, $167,331.

I do it for this reason. The question was fully and largely discussed in this House as to Seavey's Island. There could be no more necessary item than that. But the House decided that that which we had done without during the war we could continue to do without awhile longer. I do not mean to test the sense of the House upon every question. I consider that vote as an instruction to us, and I mean to act upon it, that large items which we have done without during the war we can do without for another year. I mean to acquiesce in it, so far as I am concerned, and therefore I go for striking out this item which I think we can do without very conveniently.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine, which are as follows:

For purchase of Oakman & Eldridge's wharf, $135,000.

I do not know but that it would be only postponing the evil day to strike that section out now, but I propose to postpone it as long as we can. We had this matter up in the last Congress, as gentlemen who were here will well recollect, and it was very fully discussed. This provision passed this House, but the Senate struck it out, and the House concurred in the action of the Senate, and hence it failed. I did not suppose that the proposition would be here again quite so soon, and I am sorry that I have not more than five minutes to call attention to some facts which I have before me, and which were developed during the discussion in the last Congress. I hold in my hand affidavits of parties in Charlestown in regard to this whole matter. It was found, in the first place, that there is no real necessity for the purchase of this property, and in the second place that it is a mere matter of speculation. These facts were proved conclusively by affidavits which were read in the last Congress.

I have within the last few days received a letter from the mayor of Charlestown on this subject, to which I will call the attention of the committee. The mayor seems to have known what my action in regard to this matter in the last Congress was, and he has written to me on the subject. I may say that he is a patriotic gentleman, representing as patriotic a town as there is in the United States, where Bunker Hill is. He addresses me as follows:

CITY OF CHARLESTOWN, MASSACHUSETTS,
MAYOR'S OFFICE, January 29, 1866.

SIR: It appears that the proposition of enlarging the navy-yard in this city is again before Congress for consideration.

Our city is decidedly opposed to the measure, as its enlargement will take more of our territory, and thereby withdraw it from municipal improvement and taxation. The feeling is quite general in this community that the project is fostered by speculators and those owning the land which it is proposed to purchase.

Was there a real necessity for the land, on the part of the Government, this city would not interpose a single objection, but there is good ground for believing that within the present limits of the yard there is ample space for all the requirements of the Government.

By the vote of the city council, passed January 22, 1866, I am instructed to take such action as shall tend to bring the whole subject fairly in view, and thereby secure the interests of the city.

I am informed by my predecessor, ex-mayor Stone, that you have interested yourself in this matter, which is my reason for addressing you at the present time.

Have you copies of the evidence which was presented two years ago? It was printed in the Charlestown Advertiser? How soon will the subject be brought up for discussion? Can I be of any service, and is any additional evidence required? If my presence is immediately required please telegraph to me at my expense. If not, write, and state if you desire any further evidence, or whether it is advisable for me to attend at Washington. By so doing you will confer a favor upon me.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHAS. ROBINSON, JR., Mayor.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, M. C.

That is the letter of the mayor. I cannot in the five minutes that are allowed me read the affidavits which were produced here during the last Congress, and which I have in the Globe before me, showing the facts in regard to the value of the property. If I recollect aright, it was shown that all of this property, half of which it is proposed to purchase for $135,000, was purchased for less than one half of that sum.

On the ground, in the first place, that there is no real necessity for the purchase of this property, and on the further ground that it is a mere matter of speculation, I am opposed to the proposition of the committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if this is the same mayor who was in office during the last Congress?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; I believe not.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to strike out lines one hundred and forty, one hundred and forty-one, and one hundred and forty-two, which are as follows:

New York:
For machine shop, main building, $289,612.

Mr. KASSON. Will my colleague explain why he moves to strike out that provision? I should be glad to know his reasons.

Mr. GRINNELL. I make this motion to carry out the general policy that has been indicated by the House in regard to this appropriation bill. I think we have passed by objects fully as meritorious and fully as much required by the necessities of the country as this appropriation. That is the only reason I have.

We have here an appropriation of $298,612. I do not believe there is any necessity for this appropriation at this time, and therefore I move to strike it out. I am for reducing our expenditures. With such a mighty Navy as we now have, and which has served all our purposes during the war, I think we can afford to let some of our ships lie up and some of our men rest.

Mr. KASSON. I find it in vain to call for reasons, under certain circumstances, where there are none to be given. If my colleague, [Mr. GRINNELL,] or any other gentleman here, has heard the testimony of any officer of the Department, or of any Representative upon this floor from the district in which this navy-yard is situated, or of any person who has investigated this subject or claims to have any personal knowledge upon it, I should be glad to hear it.

It is necessary here for me to say that while I did oppose the acquisition of Seavey's Island, upon the rule which I think the House ought to adopt touching these matters, that appropriations for mere convenience ought not to be made, I also stated that where these appropriations were necessary for the commercial and effective conduct of the public business they ought to be made.

I find, now, this condition of things, to which I desire to call the attention of the House, that the effect of the indiscriminate striking out of these appropriations will be this: that when we come to vote upon this bill in the House there will be an effort to combine the interests of all parties and get back into this bill all these appropriations, some of which ought not to be adopted, and some of which ought to be adopted. I therefore call upon the true economists in this House to exercise their discrimination at this time, and retain those appropriations that ought to be retained, and reject those that ought to be rejected.

This navy-yard at New York, as is well known to all, is the great central navy-yard of the country; it is located at the great commercial center of the country. The provisions now existing for the conduct of the naval business at that navy-yard are inadequate for the proper execution of that business. And the committee, after reducing by some millions the entire estimates of the Navy Department, find themselves met here in this House by a general proposition still further to reduce the appropriations, without any reason being given for the particular application of the rule.

Now, I desire to say this much, to restrain the action of this committee and of the House upon the rule which they adopted by their action the other day; that I am not aware that a single member of the Committee on Appropriations was opposed to this appropriation for the navy-yard at New York. And unless, therefore, we adopt in Committee of the Whole the appropriations which should be adopted, we shall find the bill swollen by several hundreds of thousands of dollars when the vote comes to be taken in the House, by a combination of all interests to get these appropriations back. And for this reason I ask that this appropriation for the navy-yard at New York may be adopted as a necessary appropriation, one so certified to us by the officers of the Navy Department, and which I suppose is known to the gentlemen from the cities of New York and Brooklyn upon this floor.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word of it. And I wish to add to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has said, that this is not an appropriation to commence a new work. The work has already been authorized by Congress, and a partial appropriation has already been made for its construction.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. Can the gentleman refer us to the law in which that appropriation was made?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not recollect whether it was made in the very last appropriation bill, or in the last but one. But the work is now in process of construction. Previous appropriations have been made for that purpose, and this appropriation is to pay for the work in part which has been constructed, and to pay for that which is yet to be constructed to complete the building. I presume that that statement will be sufficient to satisfy the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] who made the objection.

Mr. PIKE. In the debate in the Committee of the Whole the other day, as has been very well said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, it was argued that as we had got along through the war without these new works, we could now, at this period and in the present condition of our finances, get along for a year or two without these large appropriations. Upon that ground, an important appropriation for an increase of the navy-yard at Kittery was refused by the committee. It is now proposed that at a less advantageous place, where work is done, as is shown by the records of the Navy Department, very much less cheaply, an appropriation of $1,500,000 shall be made, mainly for new works. Now, I think that the committee, in order to be consistent with itself, should sustain the motion to strike out this appropriation, together with the other appropriations in this section for new works. For one, I am prepared to vote to sustain that proposition, so that when the time comes, if it ever shall come, when we are to increase the naval constructive forces of the country, we shall begin at the proper, the most economical place, and not at the most expensive place. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Iowa will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon this amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DARLING. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to amend by striking out the word "eight" in line one hundred and forty-two.

It is well known, sir, that throughout the period of the war the navy-yard at New York city was entirely inadequate for the performance of the work demanded of it by the requirements of the country; and the Navy Department was obliged to get the necessary work performed outside of its own yards, in order to preserve the efficiency of its Navy, and to keep it afloat. A large amount of work has been contracted for and put under way in that yard, and without these appropriations that work must stop. It is, in my judgment, very poor economy to permit work in progress to decay and go to ruin for want of the necessary appropriations to complete such work.

Why, sir, are we to bid the nation pause in all its great works now in progress, because the rebellion has terminated? Have we, because the war has ended, ceased to be a nation? Have we ceased to need a Navy or an Army? If so, then let members vote against all appropriations of the public money for military or naval purposes.

Sir, in the name of my constituents in the city of New York, I demand that these great public works, which the interests of the country requires should be carried forward, shall not be crippled by a blow at all necessary appropriations. Sir, have not the Committee on Appropriations had this matter in their charge? Have they not carefully considered it? Certainly they have; and now, when they, after examining all the bearings of the question, ask the House to adopt these appropriations, I trust gentlemen will not, without sufficient reason, move to strike out appropriations which have received the sanction of the committee, because believed to be necessary.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think there was a great deal of force in what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] said, that the Committee of the Whole, in passing upon the question of Seavey's Island, had declared as a general principle that we are to strike out of this bill all expenditures not absolutely necessary. I am free to say that I think this bill embraced no more meritorious appropriation of this class than that for Seavey's Island. I know very well that the Portsmouth navy-yard is one of the best navy-yards for ship building in the United States. I believe that ships can be built better and more cheaply at that yard than at any other in the country. That appropriation for Seavey's Island was, therefore, one of the strongest possible cases of its kind that could be presented to us. But the House, after due deliberation, decided to strike out that appropriation, and in doing so initiated, in my view, a principle which, properly applied, will strike out from this bill appropriations amounting in the aggregate to millions of dollars.

Now, I call the attention of the committee to the stupendous appropriations which are here asked for the New York navy-yard, amounting to $1,300,000—

A MEMBER. One million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I stand corrected—$1,500,000, not for the commencement of new works, not for necessary repairs of great and permanent improvements; and

I have failed to be convinced by anything said by the gentleman from New York that there is any necessity, now that the war has closed, in the present state of the Treasury, to make this vast appropriation. And, sir, I shall move, if no one else does, item by item, that they be stricken out so far as regards the New York navy-yard.

Now, one word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] He said that by striking out these items, one by one, a combination may be formed so as to pass them in the House. I am willing to leave it to the House; I am willing to leave it to gentlemen of the House to form combinations to vote in these appropriations if they desire to do so. For one, I am against them, both here and in the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman who has just taken his seat will not accuse the members on this side of the House of any combination in reference to the passing of appropriations contained in this bill, as the distribution of patronage is entirely in the hands of his own party. But, sir, there are questions which touch the interests, not only of that side of the House, but receive the approval of members on this side. Of these there is none more vital to the prosperity of the country than the strength and glory of your Navy. One of the great sources of wealth is the merchant marine which is protected by the Navy; and for the keeping up of that naval establishment the appropriations here set forth are absolutely necessary.

The gentleman asks for arguments on the necessity of this measure. I do not think the history of this war has had that effect on the gentleman's mind which it ought to have had. He is eternally bringing in resolutions in favor of some general or other.

But when appropriations are asked for the Navy, which did such splendid service, the gentleman opposes them. He praises generals, and is ready to vote for any appropriation that may be asked for the military establishment, but when appropriations are asked for the Navy and for those who labor for the profit and honor of the country in our various navy-yards, he raises his stentorian voice and attempts to roar them down. Why, sir, the navy-yards and machine shops of this country have to compete successfully with those of our great commercial rival. The gentleman in his hot haste seems to have forgotten that important fact; and it would seem also to be necessary to enlighten his mind by the repetition of the important truth that we should always make preparation in time of peace for any possible occasion of war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the great requisites of the Navy and of the merchant marine in this country, is to have machine shops for the purpose of producing the most capable machinery to compete upon the high seas with the steam marine of any other nation. We are behind the world to-day on this question of building steam engines. Whenever we build a great steam-engine, it is at great cost to ourselves in the original outlay; and it is only in the shops of the Government we can compete at all with the Clyde steamers which are built abroad. It is known to everybody that Great Britain by her subsidies to lines of steamers in every part of the world, and by the immense amount of capital which is invested in the machine shops of Scotland, lends every aid to her mercantile marine. But the gentleman in his exclusive preferences for military commanders seems entirely to forget the Navy, and specially vents his indignation against that important body of laborers who are employed in our several navy-yards. He would deprive them of these appropriations, and of the means which are necessary for their support. There is a large number of apprentices in the navy-yards, who are employed directly at the public expense. They are brought up in these machine shops, and are educated so as to enable them to assist the country in securing that success which we all must desire in competing with the great nations of Europe, as well as with the great capitalists who are engaged in ship-building.

But we are told that it is necessary to strike these appropriations out so as to economize the expenditures of the Government. In view of the schemes which have been offered, on the other side during this session, this seems to be a very strange argument to be advanced by them. Why should we cripple the Navy by refusing these appropriations when we have measures not only for the appropriation of enormous sums of money but for the distribution of the public domain for every purpose under heaven? Why, sir, we have had this morning a bill before us distributing fifty million acres of the public land. Where, then, was the wrath of this Achilles? Why, sir, he was behind the ships of Greece, I suppose, in order to let the Trojans win.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, it is true, as the gentleman has said, the war being over, expenses heretofore incurred by the Navy may now be dispensed with. I had the honor to state to the House a few days ago, when speaking upon this bill, that according to my recollection the appropriations were $150,000,000 for last year, and that the estimates of the Department were for $23,000,000, and not $123,000,000 as I was made to say; that from that comparatively small appropriation of $23,000,000 the Committee on Appropriations deducted about five or six millions, leaving seventeen or eighteen millions as the amount in this bill. I quite agree with gentlemen that this is not the time to commence extensive works, but do not remember it has been advocated at any time to be expedient and advisable that the Government should abandon works which have already been commenced and are in a partial state of construction.

And I desire to call attention to the fact that the items, as far as I have looked at them on page 7 of this bill, are for works that are still in progress at the navy-yard in New York.

This bill is not in my charge, but I have taken pains to examine these items, and as I said when I was on the floor before, the appropriation asked for for this machine shop is to carry on and complete a building that has already been authorized, and for which an appropriation has been made. The same is true also of the next item; also for the third and fourth; also for the quay-wall.

Now, it is for the committee to consider at this time whether they will leave these buildings in an unfinished condition and abandon the work altogether in these yards, or whether they will go on and complete the work which has already been authorized, and upon which large sums of money have already been expended. These works were commenced, I am reminded, during the war. That is entirely true. But now by the recurrence of peace we do not abandon our Navy nor our naval establishments. These works were projected at a time when nearly all the private establishments of the country were in requisition to provide material for the Navy, and they were designed to be no larger than should be necessary after the return of peace. They are projected and established upon the basis of a peace establishment, and now if the Congress of the United States shall say that it is not expedient to have larger facilities for repairing vessels, when we have got two or three times the number that we had then, let them say so.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire of the gentleman how much has really been expended on these improvements when we were in war, and how much we would want. Of course the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs knows. I see an additional appropriation of $587,000.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will say that this bill comes not from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and is not in their charge. It comes from the committee authorized by the House, and by this House charged with the duty of examining the estimates that are sent in here by the Treasury Department, and of reporting upon those estimates, such as they think are well sustained, and rejecting those which they think are not well sustained. Now, sir, I desire to say that it will puzzle the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] or anybody else to carry in his head for three or four years the amount of money that has been expended in building or any other work for which appropriations have been repeatedly made. I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee. I will only ask permission to send to the Chair the report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PIKE. How much is this building to cost?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Two hundred and ninety-eight thousand six hundred and twelve dollars.

Mr. PIKE. What is the aggregate appropriation?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I figure it up $587,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment, and I will renew it.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. We have been for two or three years making appropriations for this identical machine shop and iron-plating shop. The works are in progress, they are nearly completed, and it will be found by looking a little further down this bill that there is an appropriation for machinery in this very building that this appropriation proposes to complete. Now, why will gentlemen, on general declarations, propose to have these uncompleted works to go to ruin? That is the simple question. We last year find an estimate of $150,000 for the continuation of these works. This year it is proposed to appropriate an amount for their completion, putting the machinery in, and making them effective. The appropriation of last year was for all the purposes of the New York navy-yard. The appropriation this year is for the completion—although that language is not used—of the work on the machine shop, because you find below an appropriation also to put the machinery in.

With this simple explanation of facts I have discharged my duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I leave it to the Committee of the Whole to say whether they will abandon a work nearly completed or continue it. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. RAYMOND. I renew the amendment. I do it for the purpose of saying that these sums seem very large, and it is always something that every one likes to do to get rid of large appropriations if possible, but I take it that gentlemen here must be aware that large undertakings require large expenses. It is for the House to decide, not whether it is worth while to undertake works, but whether it shall appropriate money for works already undertaken.

I desire simply to read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy what is there said upon the three first items under this head, and with that, furnishing the only explanation I think the committee will require, I will leave the subject.

With regard to the machine shop and other buildings for which an appropriation is asked, the Secretary says:

"Machine shop, main building.—A partial appropriation was made for this building, and the work commenced; but the experience of the past four years has demonstrated that the building as first proposed would not be of sufficient size to meet the wants of the yard. The plans have therefore been revised and the building enlarged, and consequently, the expense increased. To meet this increase and complete the building, the sum now estimated will be required."

"Boiler shop.—This building is much needed, the present shop being entirely too small for the work required. It is proposed to build a large boiler shop in connection with the machine shop, and this item is considered one of much importance."

"Iron-plating shop.—A small appropriation was made for this building, but, owing to the immense increase in the cost of materials and labor, it was found impossible to erect a proper building for the money."

An additional estimate is therefore submitted for the construction of such a building as will supply the facilities for executing this important work in an economical and expeditious manner.

Receiving-store.—This building has been authorized and is in rapid progress; but owing to the great advance in the cost of materials and labor since the estimate was made, as well as from the fact that a portion of the site has proved of such a character as to require heavy piling, it becomes necessary to ask for an additional appropriation. An estimate is therefore submitted.

Office building.—The office accommodations are entirely insufficient for the large number of officers now attached to this yard; they are inconveniently arranged, having been increased from time to time to meet the wants of the yard. It is proposed to erect a building for the purpose, so arranged that those officers having frequent business together may be located near to each other. The building is much needed, and an estimate is therefore submitted.

Officers' houses.—This yard is also deficient in quarters for the officers on duty; their presence is often required at night, and it is deemed important that they should be provided with houses in the yard, so that their services may be always available. An estimate is submitted for such houses as are necessary to supply deficiencies.

There is the whole of it; and I am quite willing to leave the committee to decide upon the question.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether this document he has just been reading was committed to him by the Secretary of the Navy to communicate to the House, or whether it is merely at his own option that he has presented it, or was it given to him to communicate to the country through his paper?

I understood him to say, when he had an opportunity, through the kindness of the chairman of a certain committee, that he did not want at any time, and was unaware of any occasion when he could be in any especial combination or alliance with myself; and he rather insinuated that that sort of thing was not possible. I only want to give the gentleman an opportunity of withdrawing from his present position, for if he is advocating this appropriation because of its merits, he and myself are on the same side. I call his attention to the fact that the insinuation applies just as well to this case as it did to the question of lands in the South, when a matter was in his hands and he was expected to advocate an amendment which General Sherman's letter to the President was expected to aid him in advocating. I make this statement upon information; I do not know anything about it myself. I call the attention of the House to the fact that circumstances may occur under which I may be found in very bad company.

Mr. RAYMOND. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BERGEN. I renew the amendment to the amendment. The question arises whether navy-yards are necessary at all. According to the argument of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], the country should have no navy-yards. But if navy-yards are necessary, let us make the appropriations which are required to make such improvements as the exigencies of the age demand. If the Government intends to build its own vessels in the public yards, then it is necessary that they should erect the necessary means, shops and buildings. They must either do that, or abandon the building of vessels in the public yards, and resort to the ship-yards of private individuals. If gentlemen desire to be so very economical, they better introduce a bill to sell all our navy-yards, and abandon altogether the idea of building vessels at the public expense.

So far as the city of Brooklyn is concerned, I have no doubt it would be to her interest to have this navy-yard closed. But that would not be to the interest of the Government. It is to the interest of the Government to put in that yard all that is necessary to carry on the business it desires to carry on there. I hope, therefore, that this appropriation will not be stricken out, as these buildings have been erected at a great expense, and this appropriation is necessary to complete them, and make them such as will enable the Government to carry on its business properly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had supposed, when this bill was under consideration a few days ago, that we then adopted a policy which was to be carried out in respect to all appropriations in this bill. And if the arguments of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] are worth anything, they are as forcible in favor of the appropriation for the purchase of Seavey's Island as they are in favor of the appropriations for the machines, shops, buildings, and other materials in the New York navy-yard. Let me suggest to those gentlemen that during the pendency of the war the Government found it necessary to rent a portion of Seavey's Island; and they sent down there over one hundred marines, for whom they put up barracks upon the island, for the defense of the inner harbor of Portsmouth. And the Government is at this day paying a rent for that portion of the island. And the Secretary of the Navy tells us in his report that the inner harbor of Portsmouth cannot be maintained against an enemy without Seavey's Island and fortifications put upon it for that purpose.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] also tells us that New York is the great commercial center of this country, and therefore the navy-yard at New York should be maintained, and made a first-class navy-yard. Now, in case of a war, I apprehend that the navy-yard at Portsmouth would have to protect as extended a coast as the navy-yard at New York. And the work of the Navy, according to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, is done more cheaply at the Portsmouth navy-yard than it is done at the New York navy-yard; so that every argument which holds in favor of this appropriation for the New York navy-yard would hold good in favor of the appropriation for the navy-yard at Portsmouth.

But the gentleman is opposed to that appropriation; and why? Simply because he does not understand the wants of that yard as well as he seems to understand the wants of the New York navy-yard. Now, I believe that all the Committee on Appropriations, with a single exception, were in favor of the appropriation of $105,000 for the purchase of Seavey's Island. I believe also that every member of this House from the States of Maine and New Hampshire who are familiar with the wants of that yard are in favor of that appropriation. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] said that he had some doubt about the propriety of the appropriation, and therefore he voted against it. Now, if we are to vote on our doubts, when those doubts have no foundation in fact, we might vote against all appropriations. I have serious doubts about the propriety of this appropriation for the New York navy-yard, and having those doubts, I shall be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. BERGEN withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I desire in all matters of legislation of this character to act with prudence and judgment. I have thought sometimes that while we are claiming to favor a system of economy, the result is that it is false economy we are favoring. But we should lay aside our prejudices in this matter, and try to understand, if we can, what appropriations are really necessary and what appropriations may be dispensed with.

Now, sir, we are told that large amounts of money have already been expended in the construction of these works at the Brooklyn navy-yard—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The last Congress, if I am not mistaken, made an appropriation of $150,000 for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, those appropriations, whatever they were, have been expended; and although the war is over, although gentlemen may think that further appropriations for construction are unnecessary, I ask them to consider whether it is wise or expedient for us to allow constructions already commenced to go to ruin; or whether it would not be wiser, now when the war is over, when the burdens of taxation are being reduced, to go on and put those works in such a state as to furnish adequate facilities whenever the changed condition of our affairs shall require them. The war in which we have lately been engaged is over; yet I fear that the legislation which is being enacted by this Congress may yet invite foreign interference and a foreign war. Sir, I for one wish to be ready whenever that hour shall come; for come when it may, I shall stand by the flag of my country.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is defended simply upon the ground of the necessity of the case. Now, it appears by the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which has been read by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND], that the appropriations already made for this work are partially expended; and it is urged, that in order to render effectual a former appropriation of $100,000 or $150,000 partially expended, it is necessary now to appropriate $489,000.

It does not appear from the report of the Secretary of the Navy how much has been expended; while it does appear that the second item, $191,000 for a machine shop, is altogether new work. So that we are called upon to appropriate the very handsome sum of half a million dollars simply for a building; and when we get down still further, we find almost two hundred thousand dollars more for machinery for that building. I hope the committee will pause before voting for this appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, for the purpose of closing debate, that the committee rise.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a single moment, that I may say a word in reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON], to correct a mistake of fact.

Mr. STEVENS. I must insist on my motion. The gentleman and myself have both had our full share in the discussion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867, had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill all debate upon the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto shall terminate in two minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, Kittery is responsible for a good deal of trouble about all these navy-yards, I find. Even for Kittery we appropriated for iron foundry, for shop, for iron-cladding, for condensers, for road and timber slips, and for various other things, a great many thousand dollars. For all the work which needed to be completed appropriations were made.

There should be no confusion as to the facts. A machine shop in New York has been commenced and is designed to be completed, and it is so certified by the report of the Secretary of the Navy. We have appropriated for it, I think, for two or three years already, and it will be ready with this appropriation, for work.

If there be works which are not commenced let them be stricken out—the committee desire it; but let no work go to wreck which has been already commenced. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the paragraph by order of the House is now closed.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to move a pro forma amendment in order to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not now in order.

The question recurred on Mr. GRINNELL'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN of Illinois, and BERGEN, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 46.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For machine shop, boiler wing, $191,460.

Mr. PIKE moved to strike the appropriation out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For iron-plating shop, $98,322.

Mr. SPALDING moved to strike the appropriation out.

The committee divided; and they were—ayes 52, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For quay-wall extension at derrick, $100,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to strike the appropriation out.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 46.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING and CONKLING were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For quay-wall extension at sewer, $100,000.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the appropriation be stricken out.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes forty-four; noes not counted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BENJAMIN and WARNER were appointed.

Mr. KASSON. There is no more reason for striking out this appropriation than for any of the others, but I suppose the vote will be the same; and I hope that there will be no division, but that the amendment will be considered as adopted, and go to the House with the other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For dredging channels, $65,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the appropriation be stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend so as to appropriate $80,000 for filling the channel up.

The CHAIRMAN decided the amendment was not in order.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For filling low places on new purchase, $100,000.

Mr. ROSS moved to strike the appropriation out.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For machinery for new machine shop, boiler shop, pattern shop, and smithery, $180,000.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the appropriation be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For the purchase of the Ruggles property, $90,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the appropriation be stricken out.

Mr. J. HUMPHREY. I rise to oppose the motion to strike out this item. In regard to this property there are certain reasons why it should not be stricken out, and I think they ought to be conclusive. I have examined the property and thoroughly understand it. It is a piece of property which it is of the utmost importance that the Government should be possessed of. It is now under lease. The former owner of the property bought from the State of New York a grant to build out seven hundred feet into the channel. After the work commenced, the Government obtained a preliminary injunction. That suit is now in progress, and it is doubtful how it may terminate. If it should terminate in favor of the former owner or his estate—for he is now deceased, and his heirs are carrying on the litigation—it would almost entirely destroy the yard. At the time that Mr. Ruggles, the former owner, lived, holding this claim, he asked the General Government something like four or five hundred thousand dollars for the property. Since his death his heirs have agreed that they would sell it at an appraisal which was made at $90,000, provided an appropriation was made for it during the present session of Congress. That also terminates the law suit. The property itself contains a portion of the very best water-front on the yard. It is worth more than the $90,000 asked for it. The gas-houses adjoining it will give more than that if this appropriation is not made, and there is thus a forfeiture of the contract. Now, if this sort of economy, which is held out in the House by the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and others, is to prevail, this appropriation may be stricken out; but it is a sort of economy which no gentleman will practice in his private affairs, and no man of business in any matter of which he has charge.

The report made by Admiral Smith—if I had time I would like to read it—contained in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, as well as that of the chief paymaster of the Navy, who is now using these buildings, states that this property is very necessary to the navy-yard. Now, if this item is stricken out, the property will pass from the possession of the United States Government, and it will prove a detriment to the yard of more than ten times the amount of the appropriation proposed.

Mr. BERGEN. I have made some inquiry in relation to this property. When I first saw the appropriation I was opposed to it; but on examination of the matter again I have arrived at the conclusion that it is to the interest of the Government to purchase the property. If the navy-yard is to be continued there then the Government will be compelled at some time or other to purchase it. It ought, therefore, to be purchased now. The Government at this time hires the property. It is now using it. It has found it necessary to rent it. Now, it is cheaper to buy than to rent it. We can buy it now on favorable terms. The former owner is dead, and it is in the hands of the heirs. They may sell it for division. They offer to sell now on fair terms. If the Government neglects to buy it, it will probably be cut up into small parcels, lots of twenty-five feet front, and instead then of having one set of owners to deal with, we shall have perhaps some thirty or forty, and it will cost double or treble the amount that it is now proposed to pay for it. I have known instances in that part of the country where land, under similar circumstances, has been sold for division and has been bought afterward for $2,000, whereas before the division it was offered for $800. Now the Government has an opportunity to buy this property at a fair price. It is to its interest to avail itself of this opportunity. The Government sometimes, like individuals, is penny wise and pound foolish. The water on this front is deeper than on any portion of the front of the navy-yard. It has a front of some three hundred feet on the East river. It is necessary for building large vessels. If it was not necessary for the use of the Government, it would not be occupying and renting it. I hope, therefore, that the appropriation will not be stricken out.

Mr. DARLING. I move to strike out the last line. Sir, I hope the House will pause before they strike out this appropriation. The matter has been fully explained by my colleagues. But there is one point I desire to bring to the consideration of the House. This property is located between the street and the navy-yard. It is the only property not owned by the Government between that street and the yard. It is absolutely necessary for the protection of our Government property that this piece of land should belong to the United States. In addition to that, it gives us a very large additional water-front, not only the front immediately on the property, but the front on the street adjoining, which will come under the control of the Government and can be used by it by act of the Legislature of our State.

Now, sir, a mere appropriation of $90,000 for a piece of property under such circumstances and of so much value should certainly find favor in this House as a mere matter of investment, the Government getting three dollars for one. It is not wasting money; it is not expending money that you are never going to see again. It is money expended for the actual, necessary uses of the Government, for the protection of its property and the convenience of its business. I therefore hope that the committee will consent to retain this appropriation in the bill.

Mr. PRICE. The only reply I have to make to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DARLING] in reference to this matter is simply this: that the Government of the United States is not now in a condition financially to go into any speculations in real estate. It will be time enough for us to undertake a measure of that kind when we shall have paid our honest debts that are pressing upon us at this time.

Another consideration is that the Government has got along without this property for the last thirty years, and if thirty years' experience has proven that the operations of the Navy of the United States can be successfully carried on without the Ruggles property, I presume it is safe to say that for the next few years, until we are in a better condition financially, we will be able to get along in the future as we have done in the past.

Mr. BERGEN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and ALLEY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. J. HUMPHREY. I move to insert after line one hundred and sixty the following:

For protecting from destruction and decay unfinished buildings and structures already commenced, for which no appropriation is made in this bill, $20,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to strike out lines one hundred and sixty-seven, one hundred and sixty-eight, and one hundred and sixty-nine, which are as follows:

Philadelphia:
For dredging channels, $4,023.

Mr. PIKE. I hope that will not be stricken out. It was demonstrated in the last Congress that the water is very shallow in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, and it is therefore necessary that this dredging should be done. [Laughter.]

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to strike out lines one hundred and seventy-one and one hundred and seventy-two, which are as follows:

For Bulkley's patent dryer, with buildings complete, $35,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say one word upon this subject. This is a new invention, which has been thoroughly tested, by which it is found that in one day you can season lumber that by ordinary processes it would take months to season. This is, perhaps, of as much importance as any item in the bill. The invention has been fully tested at the navy-yard here, and found to be of much service. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his motion to strike out.

Mr. CONKLING. Everybody knows that there is no braver man in this House than the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and he never showed his courage more than he does in proposing to this committee that they shall vote money to pay for a patent right, a new invention. Why, sir, I am perfectly astonished; after we have been striking out appropriations for necessary repairs, after the committee have voted over and over again to leave buildings partially completed, which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says will go to wreck and ruin, that any gentleman should have the courage to rise here and propose that we shall pay such a sum of money as this for some bran-new patent right for doing something or other that has always been done in some other way. And I hope, upon the most ordinary principles of consistency and economy, such an outrage will not be committed as the making an appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. We have saved enough by striking out appropriations for the New York navy-yard to pay for this twenty times over. [Laughter.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. CONKLING, and there were, upon a division—ayes 57, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to strike out the following:

For repairs of all kinds, $58,480.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that will not be stricken out. We have not struck out appropriations for repairs.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is no reason why we ought not to strike out any.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out the clause reading "for completing saw-mill, $25,000." I do not see what use there is for a saw-mill if we do not have a dryer. [Laughter.]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike out this clause, in relation to the Norfolk navy-yard:

For repairs of dry dock, masonry, and gates, $20,000.

And I shall move to strike out all of the part relating to the Norfolk navy-yard, as it is read, for the reason that I do not now want to rebuild these navy-yards. The rebels destroyed them, and I do not propose to rebuild them for them perhaps to again destroy and burn them.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] as this may have some connection with reconstruction, if our rule does not require it to go to the joint committee on reconstruction without debate? [Laughter.] But I wish to say that when we refuse to make appropriations for the necessary repairs of our navy-yards in the loyal States, I can see no reason why we should make appropriations for navy-yards in a foreign territory. If we are going to act on this system of economy, let us do so in our own dominions and not in our foreign dominions.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent of the committee to pass upon the question of striking out all these items in gross, in relation to the Norfolk navy-yard, as they all depend upon the same principles.

Mr. KASSON. I must object to that. And I wish to say a word on the motion to strike out this paragraph for repairs, &c., of the Norfolk navy-yard. That yard is already in a condition to be of essential service to the Government: the Government is already using it to a considerable extent. We made an appropriation for it last year, and it is now considered by the Navy Department of great consequence for the economical repair and use of the Navy. If gentlemen regard it simply as an appropriation for the benefit of certain persons residing in the neighborhood, it is eminently proper of course to strike it all out. If, on the contrary, they desire to make the yard fit for the economical administration of the Navy Department, and give them facilities for repairs and the necessary buildings at the navy-yard, where it can be done cheaper than it would be to crowd all the work in other navy-yards, then these appropriations should be retained.

So far as I know, the Committee on Appropriations were perfectly unanimous in regard to these appropriations, and they are moderate in comparison with the magnitude of the yard. I think it would be about as appropriate to strike out the appropriation for any other navy-yard as to strike out these; and it would be no more to the detriment of an economical administration of the Navy Department. It is well known that between New York and Pensacola there is but this one navy-yard, and it is of very essential importance both as a station for the Navy and for repairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If this clause shall be stricken out by the committee, I will then move an amendment like the one moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. J. HUMPHREY,] in reference to the New York navy-yard, making an appropriation of $20,000 to keep what Government property there is there in repair.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois was then agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would now suggest, for the purpose of saving time, that a vote be taken upon all the rest of the appropriations for the Norfolk navy-yard, as the vote just taken is probably a test vote.

Mr. KASSON. I must object to that. I think it ought not to be done, because we must make some of the appropriations here named in order to be able to continue to use the yard as it is now. It is the merest insanity to strike out in this sweeping manner appropriations for things of so much necessity for the proper administration of the Navy Department.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to strike out the following:

For quay-wall, $15,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to strike out the following:

For iron and copper store No. 11, $35,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to strike out the following:

For ship-joiners' shop and timber shed No. 12, $45,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to strike out the following:

For furniture and galley storehouse No. 13, $36,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to strike out the following:

For storehouse No. 14, $16,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS moved to strike out the following:

For completion of stables, $10,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to strike out the following:

For railway track and cars, $8,000.

Mr. KASSON. If it is possible for gentlemen to pause a moment, I will say that this appropriation is necessary to make the property now there useful.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to strike out the following:

For new dredging machine, scows, and dredging, $45,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to strike out the following:

For new shears, $30,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out line two hundred and eight, reading as follows:

For building for offices, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out, in line two hundred and nine, these words:

For machinery and tools, $50,000.

Mr. KASSON. That item is necessary to make effective the usual repairs at the yard.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out in line two hundred and ten the words "fifty-six" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty;" so that the line will read:

For repairs of all kinds, $20,000.

Mr. KASSON. In order to show the committee the character of the yard as it now is, and the importance of these appropriations, I will call attention to the fact that we appropriated last year for that yard $468,500. This shows conclusively that there is there a very large and valuable property, which it is our duty to make useful to the Government; and in view of those specific works, the appropriations for which we have struck out, thereby rendering necessary some additional accommodations, the amount here appropriated for repairs ought not to be struck out nor even reduced.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy ought to be instructed to dispose of, at public sale, all the Government property at Norfolk not necessary for the naval service; and that which is necessary for that service ought to be removed to some other location more suitable for a navy-yard. As I understand, that is an unhealthy location for a navy-yard.

A MEMBER. Unhealthy politically, especially.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The navy-yard established there by the Government some years since has, within the last five years, gone to decay and ruin, simply from the unhealthiness of the location. I refer more especially to a disease known as "secesh on the brain;" and it will be remembered that it attacked that navy-yard with great violence in 1861. I think that not a single dollar ought to be appropriated for rebuilding that navy-yard. Let us appropriate only the amount that may be necessary for the removal of the Government property to a more suitable location. It seems to me absurd to appropriate fifty or sixty thousand dollars for repairs at that yard. If it is to be a navy-yard equal to the demands of the Government, appropriations of three or four hundred thousand dollars annually will be necessary to keep it up. Appropriations of fifty, sixty, or seventy thousand dollars are just so much thrown away, or, in other words, given to the beneficiaries of the Government there.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment, and offer the following:

Strike out line two hundred and ten, reading as follows: "For repairs of all kinds, $50,000;" and insert the following:

"For the protection of the navy-yard at Norfolk, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to know from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] what amount of money will be required to put that navy-yard in as complete a condition as it was before the rebellion.

Mr. KASSON. I refer the gentleman to the estimates of the Navy Department as the only information that he or I can procure.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want a direct answer. I do not wish to be referred to the report of the Secretary of the Navy. Does the gentleman himself know?

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will take the trouble which any legislator who desires to be well informed should take, if he will look at the book which has been placed in his hands, he will find that $484,500 was the amount asked, and that we have now struck out a part of that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Allow me a word.

Mr. KASSON. I will if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It shall not.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman can follow me.

At the Norfolk navy-yard, right there at that unhealthy spot, at the beginning of the rebellion there were about one thousand laborers, as honest, as loyal, as devoted to the Government of the United States as men can be found anywhere; and whenever they had protection against the enemy's military force, they organized Union Leagues and established the operations of a loyal government there. And this bitter spirit to deprive these laborers of support, many of whom have gone from the North since the war has commenced, is unworthy of us.

We have millions of property useful to the Navy Department requiring these appropriations, and they ought to be granted, or we ought to have a proposition for the abandonment entirely of that navy-yard, and such a one should be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs before it was acted on by the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, even in a charitable point of view, cannot be supported, for $20,000 would not keep one thousand men for thirty days.

When I asked the gentleman what amount of money it would require to put this navy-yard in the same condition it was in before the rebellion, and he responded if I had gone to the ordinary channels of information I could have found out, I considered his answer an impertinent one. Had he possessed the knowledge he would have answered my question. He only wanted an excuse to cover his ignorance.

The Secretary of the Navy asks for $468,000. Next session of Congress we will be asked for half a million more; and then half a million more. So far as my knowledge goes, at least, it would require $1,500,000.

A MEMBER. Five million dollars.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Some say $5,000,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Ten million dollars were appropriated and expended by the Government on that navy-yard before the breaking out of the rebellion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It could not be restored for less than $1,500,000. It is said to be a mass of ruins, and that the only object there is to protect the property of the Government. The gentleman from Iowa does not propose to make appropriations equal to the entire restoration of that navy-yard. Now, I say that appropriations for continuing a semblance of a navy-yard there is only so much money thrown away. I will vote only money enough to keep that navy-yard in condition until we can dispose of it; and then to establish one in a locality where the political sentiment of the people will protect it.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out the last three words. I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] has made another mistake for want of accurate information. I have been, as have many others, to that navy-yard, and I know of most of the appropriations both made and asked for. They have raised the Merrimac, and are now raising the Congress and Cumberland. A great naval store-house is necessarily there. I only ask you will appropriate as much as is necessary for the existing condition of that navy-yard. I withdraw my amendment.

The committee divided on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and there were—ayes 64, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER took the chair, and stated that the hour of half past four having arrived, the House resumed its session and took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. COBB in the chair,) and resumed, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the consideration of the President's annual message.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WELKER. Mr. Chairman, nearly ninety years, with their great events, their grand progressions in science, the arts, and in society and Governments, have passed away since our fathers, in solemn assembly, proclaimed, as the broad foundation of the Government then about to be erected, that "all men are created equal, and are endowed with certain inalienable rights," and that "among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." They declared, also, "that to secure these rights Governments are instituted among men." To maintain these bold propositions, these new ideas of equality of man, to establish a republican form of government based thereon, for seven long years, amid defeat and disaster, sufferings and deprivations unknown to the history of war, these men of the Revolution, with firmness undaunted and patriotism unchilled, fought out the battles that won for us these grand principles and established this great Republic.

When this Government was first organized it was everywhere said by politicians and publicists of the Old World that this attempt to maintain a republic on these principles would be a failure; that, like other experiments of the same kind in other periods of the world's history, it would be short-lived, and soon go down and be forgotten, or only remembered on the pages of the history of the times. It was claimed that the people were not competent to govern themselves, and all such government would be too weak to stand when the time of trial would come; that when the storms of civil war would burst upon them they would crumble to the ground as other republics before had done. All these theories and prophecies are now overthrown. For five years past we have gone through the ordeal of fire and blood to maintain the life of the nation. No nation has ever been subject to so terrible a trial. The records of the world do not present so fearful a rebellion or scarcely any civil war in which such magnificent armies and munitions of war have been brought into conflict. With these great instrumentalities we have tested the power of the Government to maintain itself against enemies within as well as without; have established again these great principles of government laid down by our fathers, and presented an example to the world of the grand experiment of free government. In the war of 1812 we sustained the Republic against foreign foes. In this contest we have saved the nation from destruction by enemies at home.

Now, after the great conflict has been fought out by our armies upon the battle-fields of our country, we, as the Representatives of the people here assembled, have a great work to do in order to preserve and perpetuate the priceless inheritance of our fathers. Our brave soldiers, in the iron hail of battle, in the toilsome march, in rain and storm, heat and cold; in the lonely prison, with sacrifice of life and health upon their country's altar, have nobly done their whole duty. Let us equally well perform ours, and this, the grandest Government of the world, will continue its triumphant march in the bright pathway leading to the highest and truest freedom of mankind.

There ought to be no difference of opinion now on this floor as to one thing, and that is, that this Government shall remain one and indivisible, and that this great people shall be one people, with one destiny and one flag. That was clearly settled by the war. One other thing was settled, and that is that our people shall be a free people, that our

"Starry flag no longer waves
In splendid mockery o'er a land of slaves."

RECONSTRUCTION.

How the Government is to be reconstructed, or restored, or the best means to reach that end, are questions about which there may well be differences of opinion. In this difference of views there may, in the end, be safety.

What are these different opinions? One party here say that these eleven States, constituting the so-called confederate government, by this great war upon the Government lost none of their rights as States to participate in the Government now; that having ceased their warfare, surrendered their arms, and disbanded their armies, all they have to do is to elect members of Congress, and they are entitled to admission here, and no questions are to be asked and no conditions imposed. As the result of the war four million slaves, that in the apportionment for representation in the House of Representatives were counted in the ratio of three to five, in the next apportionment these States will have actually, by this rebellion, gained twelve members. So that in this effort to overthrow the Government they have really increased their power and influence in the administration of the affairs of the Government. If this be so, the declaration of our patriotic President, "that treason is a crime and must be punished," is entirely ignored, and in this insidious treason is rewarded rather than punished.

Some think that by this mad attempt to overthrow the Government they have only lost their right to participate in the governing power of the country, and still remain as States with suspended animation, subject to be vitalized by the joint action of the President and Congress.

Others believe that by this attempt to separate from the parent Government, and this bitter and terrible war upon it, they have lost their character of States, forfeited their State governments, and are now mere Territories, and subject to be governed by Congress as conquered provinces until readmitted as States.

At this late period in the discussion, the whole field having been occupied so ably by others, and the questions growing out of these different views so well and forcibly discussed, I will not now attempt any lengthy remarks upon this branch of the subject of debate.

In my judgment, it makes but little difference which of these last-named views shall be adopted so that we reach the same end in the grand result. The difference is more in theory than in practical application. It is very certain that their relations to the Government has been, in some way, affected by the rebellion. It cannot be that a war of such gigantic proportions, marshaling their millions of soldiers on each side, should not in some respect change the relations of the parties to each other. The rebels, just emerging from the leadership of a self-constituted government, cannot at once and without conditions take their original place in the Government against which they warred. This would be an anomaly in history. It would falsify all the records of the past. No rebels in any Government have ever been allowed such rights, no conquered people ever so treated.

CONDITION OF THE STATES.

I do not think these States are now out of the Union. They are a part of our Government, their territory is ours, their people belong to the Government, and are subject to its control and liable to its jurisdiction. But as States they are not entitled to representation here until loyal governments are organized within their territories, and until Congress and the President do something to restore or readmit them to their proper relations with the Government. Whether they shall be regarded as mere Territories, or as States with "suspended vitality," may, it is true, be a subject of much dispute and some difficulty of correct solution, but which I will not now discuss.

These States, one by one, passed ordinances of secession, and then banded together into a confederacy and declared themselves a separate government, denied allegiance to the United States Government, and set up one for themselves. The question then arose whether they should be allowed to thus separate, or whether by force of arms their separation from the Government should be prevented. The Administration made the issue of separation or no separation. The arts of statesmanship had been exhausted. No other forum was left in which to contest this issue but the battle-field; no other trial but that of battle was left to determine this question. So the contest went on for four years.

On the 26th day of May, 1865, the decision was made by the complete surrender of their army to the authorities of the Government, in favor of the Government, and against the rebellion. What did that determine? Whether they were States in the Union or conquered provinces? No such thing. It settled that these States did not maintain their proposed separation from the Government, and their own separate existence as a government, and that this Government has a right to exercise jurisdiction over them. Those who claim that the issue was whether these eleven States were in the Union or out of it, mistake the issue. Theirs was an effort to separate, and ours to compel them to remain a part of our Government. We won and they lost. This leaves them to be judged of by the laws of civilized warfare. It is true that during the whole progress of the war, the Government treated these States and the people as subject to its control wherever it had power to do so. But in this I deny that they were treated as States in the Union, and with all their rights as States. In the last Congress, a law was passed providing that these States should not be entitled to cast any vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, thus refusing to recognize them as States entitled to the rights of other States. To say that these States had lost none of their rights as States by this war, and during its continuance and now, would be to ignore all the lights of international law, and all the authors who have written upon the subject. It is the universal testimony of the old authorities, that when separate States undertake rebellion to throw off their allegiance to a parent Government, and are subdued, they can be treated as conquered territory, and are liable to imposition of terms in reconstruction or restoration.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE.

But I will not pursue this branch of the subject further.

Now, Mr. Chairman, at the close of the war, we are met by political questions in relation to what is to be done to reconstruct or restore these States.

I am anxious that our Government shall be made a unit as soon as it can be done with safety to the great principles settled in the contest. But we should "make haste slowly" in this great work. The perpetuity, the very life of the nation, is now at stake. No graver or more responsible duties ever devolved on an American Congress than are now upon us. This is the time and this the occasion to settle for all time in this country the great ideas and principles lying at the foundations of our noble structure of government. Let these foundations now be made strong, that in coming time the winds and storms of rebellion and revolution may beat in vain against the grand fabric erected thereon. Our fathers made this for a free Government; one to which the persecuted and downtrodden of the world might fly and find secure asylum and equal rights. In the short period of less than a century, which is but a day in the life of a nation, the grand idea of our fathers was so far forgotten and departed from that we held four million of God's creatures as the brutes of the field to be sold in the market, and their unrequited toil used to nurture and support a purse-proud and haughty oligarchy of oppressors in the land.

Let us now make it what our fathers intended it to be, and secure to all their God-given rights, secure equal and exact justice to all men. To accomplish this we must not be in a hurry with the work. In this fast age we are apt to desire the accomplishment of too much in a given time. Let these men so lately engaged in the rebellion have time to satisfy us that they are thoroughly cured of many of the heresies they have heretofore entertained. They can afford to wait after what they have done against the Government, after the great injury they have inflicted upon the country—the deluge of blood, the ravages of war they have caused all over our broad land, the widows and orphans they have made, the crippled and maimed soldiers they have scattered everywhere among us. There is much for them to do in the way of improvements and reforms in their localities before they are ready to assume all the responsibilities of Government. As a matter of law most of them have forfeited their lives, and if the laws were enforced strictly against them, many of them would be hung for treason, as they ought to be. They should remember that during these bloody four years they have caused the sacrifice of millions of precious lives and thousands of millions of treasure in this mad attempt to disconnect themselves from the Government, and establish forever the infernal institution of slavery.

From the first commencement of this unholy war until their final surrender to overpowering force, these rebels never for a moment entertained any love for our Government or regret for what they had done. Now that they are conquered by our arms, they have no right to complain upon the demand of them of conditions and guarantees for the future.

FREEDMEN.

As the results of this war four million people have passed from under the clouds and darkness of slavery into the sunlight of freedom. They are God's poor—made so by the wrongs and oppressions of centuries. They must be cared for in any measures of restoration of these States. This Government by their emancipation is as solemnly bound to secure their freedom and protect their rights, as it is to pay off the debts incurred in saving the life of the nation. These freedmen, in all the dark days of the rebellion, when many white men in the North proved false to the Government, and gave aid and comfort to the enemy, were always true friends. They helped us fight the battles for freedom and national existence. They stood side by side with our brave white soldiers on the field; with them went through the baptism of fire for the country that had oppressed them; were their friends in prison, and finding ways of escape from captivity. These men and their families are now left in the midst of their former masters and oppressors. Shall they be turned out to the tender mercies of their unfriendly legislation? That must not be done. These freedmen and women constitute the principal laboring population of these States. They are as necessary to the non-working population there as the capital they own. They are mines of wealth to that people. In their dark, strong arms and loyal hearts are reposed the future development of the great resources of the sunny climes of the South, when guided by intelligence and manly independence.

In the great contest just closed the rebellion staked the ownership of this labor, the bones and muscles that performed it, and they lost in the venture. It is a great change in their social relations, and it is not to be wondered at that they are slow to accept its reality. But they must understand that the logic of events will teach them, in truth and soberness, to accept this great change and adapt themselves to it. It is a fixed fact that these colored people must remain in the late rebellious States. They cannot go anywhere else. That is their home. Their labor has improved and built up the country and created the wealth in which their oppressors have reveled. It is said that the labor system there will work itself out in the protection of these freedmen; that it will be in the end to the interest of the former master to extend protection to the rights of his colored employé. From the spirit manifested in these States since the surrender of their armies this does not seem to be correct. A spirit of bitterness, a determination to oppress and harass them in every way possible, now pervades the legislation of most of these States. In many of them there is no protection afforded the colored men. Many of these States have now in force "black codes," in which all rights are denied them. Several of them will not allow a colored man to own or rent a foot of land; deny him the benefit of schools, protection under the poor laws, or rights in court by which he can obtain redress for grievances or secure protection. While these States and their people manifest this spirit, let them remain under military authority until a better spirit is manifested. I am not at present willing to trust to the interest of these men who so lately were engaged in deadly hostility against the Government to protect this large colored population. Let us pass laws here protecting the rights of these freedmen, making the same laws for them that are made for the white man. We have already passed the Senate bill establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and through its machinery the colored man will, in some measure, be protected from wrong and oppression.

GUARANTEES.

But before these States are represented upon this floor other guarantees should be secured. Not guarantees in the shape of State constitutions or State legislation alone, for they can at any time be altered or repealed, but irrevocable ones, incorporated into the Constitution of the United States. But we are told that these States are now in the Union, and we have no right to demand any guarantees for the future; that when they elected their Representatives to Congress they must be admitted. The men who say this are now claiming to be the peculiar friends and supporters of our present Chief Magistrate, and what they call his policy of reconstruction. But I do not understand this to be his policy. As a matter of fact, has not the President treated these States as having forfeited their rights as States in the Union? Since the close of the war he has been exercising authority looking toward the restoration of these States. He has proceeded upon the assumption that some conditions were to be attached to their restoration. What has he done? He found them without governments, except disloyal ones, and he sent them provisional governors to rule them. He found their old constitutions still in existence, but he ordered elections for members of conventions to form new, or amend old ones, and prescribed the qualifications of electors. He required the Legislatures that might assemble under these constitutions to adopt the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. He required all the constitutional conventions to abolish slavery in the States, and put therein a prohibition against the payment of their debts incurred in the prosecution of the rebellion.

Now, following in the spirit of his example, and of the principle he has established, the President should not object, if Congress demands additional guarantees before complete restoration. The conditions of reconstruction, the terms of admission of members, are clearly within the authority of Congress, and a proper subject for their action. It is to be hoped that the legislative and the executive departments will, in this great duty, act in concert for the good of the country, and that harmony may prevail in the councils of the nation.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

But how are we to obtain security for the future? It cannot be done by the action of these rebellious States. I fear that as soon as they should be represented here, all such guarantees would be repealed. It must be done by appropriate amendments to the Constitution of the United States. But what amendments are demanded?

1. Let the Constitution be so amended that representation in the House of Representatives shall be based substantially on voting population, and not general population. This is the true basis of representation. Under the present system the rebel States have largely increased their representation by the rebellion. The slaves were counted and the masters voted for them. Now the freed slaves will be counted same as white population, and their former oppressors still vote for them!

I have already said that by the emancipation on the present basis of representation these States actually gain twelve additional members of Congress. This changed condition of these people requires some amendment to be made by which but fair representation shall be given them. The basis of slave representation was always unfair to the free people of the North. It gave to the white man in the South more influence and power in the Government than that possessed by the northern white man. It thereby constituted a slave oligarchy there that despised the voting "mud-sills" of the North. It gave them nineteen members of Congress based upon their slaves, and who were elected by the white slaveholders. It gives a rebel white man two and a half votes to one for the Union soldier in the North. It is true that this was given them by the makers of the Constitution as a compromise. The occasion now having passed away, let it be remedied.

As the Constitution now is, these States can so limit the franchise that but the "favored few" shall exercise it, and the great mass be deprived of participation in their government, and still not decrease the representation in Congress. They may do this either by the exclusion of races or by requiring property qualifications as condition of voting. If voting is the basis of equality of races, if this should be done their representation would be decreased. On the other hand, if they enfranchise the masses their representation will be increased. This will operate as a great inducement for the extension of suffrage.

I know that this power of disfranchisement is denied; and it is claimed that Congress can interfere to prevent it under the clause of the Constitution guarantying a republican form of government to the States. This may be so. But it will be found very difficult to determine the line defining the limits of what is republican, or what is not. How many, if any, must be disfranchised before it ceases to be republican? A majority, or a considerable minority? In the long history of oppression and tyranny in the South since the formation of our Government, in the darkest hour of its humiliation to the slave power, no congressional enactment was passed to assert this right in the General Government. It is better then to fix it sure and certain by fixing the voting population as the basis of representation, or as it is fixed in the amendment already passed the House, which excludes from count those who are denied the right of suffrage on account of race or color.

2. Amend the organic law so as to put it out of the power of these States to levy any tax or imposts to pay the rebel debt. Many loyal men are there who did not favor the rebellion who should be protected from the payment of this debt. Many men from the North will seek those States to make homes for themselves and children, carrying with them the capital, skill, and energy of our northern population, and they should be protected from such taxation. In the time to come the fertile lands of that beautiful climate will be made golden by the controlling influence of intelligent labor; its teeming population made prosperous and happy by an influx of northern enterprise and northern school systems, and the blessings of freedom and equality made perpetual among all the people.

3. If the power is not already contained in the second clause of the emancipation amendment already adopted, the Constitution should be so amended that Congress shall be fully authorized to protect the freedmen in all their rights of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in the States, and prohibit the passage of all laws, by any of the States, making any difference in the civil rights of their inhabitants, but that all, both white and black, shall stand equal before the civil and criminal law.

4. That our public creditors shall be protected from any repudiation of the public debt of the nation; that our credit may at all times be sustained, and no dishonor shall ever attach to the American character as would follow a refusal to discharge our high obligations.

Without some such provision as this in the organic law, there may be danger that men may be found who will refuse to provide such means as may be required to meet and finally discharge the public debt necessarily incurred to overthrow the rebellion and save the Republic.

SECURITY FOR THE FUTURE.

I would make these amendments conditions to restoration, on the ground of security for the future. Men once engaged in a purpose to overthrow the Government, as these traitors were, cannot be trusted with participation in managing the affairs of this great nation. Some such guarantees are necessary to insure us against a like attempt at a separation or destruction of the Constitution and Government.

LOYALTY.

More than this: some evidence should be given that the people of these States, the masses, are really cured of their political heresies, and desirous to "act justly toward all men," and live in harmony with the people of the loyal States. If we are correctly informed, however much it may be regretted, there is at this moment as much bitter feeling against the friends of the Union among them as there was during the war. This, no doubt, in the course of time will be changed, and a better and kindlier feeling prevail. There should also be satisfactory evidence that loyal governments are organized that will not array themselves against the execution of the laws that may be enacted by Congress, under the Constitution, for the common welfare.

SUFFRAGE.

It will not be doubted but that the four million freedmen in these States will be a difficult element to control. So large a population, denied rights of participation in the Government; denied proprietorship in the soil; denied all interest in the affairs of their State; kept simply to perform the labor of the country; made only "hewers of wood and drawers of water," will not quietly submit to their condition thus imposed. If it should be so, the lessons of history have not been rightly understood. In the late emancipation of the Russian serfs they were immediately enfranchised, and thus given an interest in the Government. In time the right of suffrage will be extended to our freedmen. This will be, in the end, the true theory for the solution of this great question of freedom. Those having served in the Union Army, and such as possess sufficient intelligence, should at least be admitted to this right, and others would follow in time. Those who used the musket against rebels should be armed with the ballot to defend themselves against the rebels they have fought in the battle-field.

This right of suffrage to colored men is no new thing. It was possessed by them at the time of the formation of our Government in many of the old thirteen States. It exists now in several of the States. South Carolina was the first to introduce the word "white" in her constitution, and she was the first to fire upon the glorious emblem of our nationality, as it waved over one of our forts. She has the dishonor to have taken the first step backward in the march of civilization, as she did the first step in the forward march of barbarism in the late infernal effort to found a government based upon human slavery. I hope to see the day when she may again set herself right, and return to her "first love" of the rights of man.

TRAITORS.

In this restoration no man whose heart was filled with sentiments of treason, whose hand is red with the blood of our martyred heroes, should ever be allowed to take a seat as a Representative in the American Congress. No traitor should ever be allowed to contaminate these beautiful Halls. The great and vital interests of this broad land should never, no, never, be placed in such hands. No pardons, no repentance should ever open these doors to him. These majestic emblems of freedom should never be desecrated by his presence.

UNION PARTY.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the Union party is opposed to the reunion of the States, and is trying to prevent its accomplishment. I deny any such purpose. The party that for four years carried on this war for the Union, that supported the Administration in the days of darkness and gloom against traitors at home as well as in the field, that strengthened its hands and sustained its policy, will not desert the cause now. This party, so far as I know, do not desire to keep the Representatives of those States lately in rebellion out of Congress one moment longer than is necessary for the public good. But the great question settled by this war, the great principles of eternal justice, must not be sacrificed or ignored by any act of this Union party. We all desire, I hope, the accomplishment of union and harmony with all the States represented on our common flag. But it must be done so that we shall have no more rebellions and no more controversies to embitter our relations, growing out of the causes that led to the late rebellion. These should be settled now and forever. When that is accomplished, a grand and glorious future awaits us. Then will be realized the grand purpose of our fathers in the creation of this Government. With the finest soil, the most beautiful rivers and lakes, the most enterprising and intelligent population, we will then take our stand proudly and gloriously among the nations of the world, the model Republic, with universal intelligence, freedom, and equality, as the great lights to guide us in our advancement in the pathway of civilization. Then may we well exclaim of our country: How beautiful are thy tabernacles! What people are like unto thee? The high places are thine, and there shalt thou stand firmly, innocently, and securely.

PUNISHMENT OF TRAITORS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no written speech prepared to read to you this evening, and the remarks that I shall make will be brief, and of an extemporaneous character.

I propose for a short time to investigate a subject brought to view in the message of the President, on the eleventh page, if I recollect right, where he speaks of treason against the Government having been committed, and of the necessity of trying traitors and punishing them, making the crime of treason infamous. I regard this as a very important question; and notwithstanding I have heard many able speeches and many hours of debate on this floor, I have heard but little allusion to this subject. I have no doubt that this subject is to some extent unpopular, from false impressions that have been made by many, by efforts that have been made to stigmatize those that believe treason is a crime, and that it ought to be punished, and to represent them as acting from motives of malice or hatred toward the South. Now, sir, I do not feel that I have any hatred to the South, or any disposition to take revenge upon any man. It was my fortune to be born in that portion of our country denominated the South. I spent more than thirty years of my life in that part of the world. I was born among slaveholders and was surrounded to some extent by slaves, and if I have prejudices—and I suppose I have, for it would be a very singular circumstance to find a man that was not to some extent under the influence of prejudice—those prejudices are in favor of the South and southern people.

But, sir, I believe that the happiness and the welfare of this great Republic demand that we shall have a Government, and that that Government shall be maintained inviolate.

The object of government, Mr. Chairman, I understand to be, not to confer rights and privileges upon men, but to secure to each and every inhabitant of the land the rights that God has bestowed upon him. Good government aims to secure, not the rights of a part of the citizens, but of each and every one; not a part of the rights of each and every one, but the full, free, and untrammelled exercise and enjoyment of all those rights that God has bestowed upon human nature. This I understand to be the design of government. And just in proportion as this enjoyment of all these rights is secured to the inhabitants of a country, just in that proportion are those inhabitants happy and prosperous. And just in proportion as these natural rights are invaded and trampled upon, so do the people become wretched and miserable.

Then, sir, it is not only necessary that we should have laws defining the duties of citizens to each other, but that those laws should have penalties annexed to them. Every man knows that laws without penalties amount to the same as no laws at all. It is admitted that laws must have just and adequate penalties to secure the rights and the welfare of the citizens. And not only must there be just and adequate penalties, but those penalties must be inflicted upon the transgressor. This fact is so clear that it admits of no controversy.

That the penalty of laws must be inflicted has been acknowledged by all the nations of the earth from the earliest period of its history. In the case of Daniel, the prophet, who violated the law of the king of the Medes and Persians, the king became convinced that he had been led into error in promulgating the law that he did, but the law having been promulgated, and his favorite minister having violated it, he studied until the going down of the sun in order to devise some plan by which he might release Daniel from the penalty that he had incurred. But when he was reminded that the time was drawing near when the penalty of the law must be inflicted, he reluctantly, but at the same time firmly, ordered that the penalty should be enforced upon the transgressor, showing the deepest regret that he had been placed in circumstances where it was necessary to do such a thing. But at the same time the welfare of the empire demanded that it should be done; and the laws of the Medes and Persians changed not.

I remember also reading the history of another king, who issued a proclamation or enacted a law at a certain time, that any one of his subjects who committed a certain crime should have both his eyes put out; and the story is that the son of that monarch was the first individual that was convicted of violating the law. The monarch, as a matter of course, felt great reluctance to put out the two eyes of his son, and at the same time he felt that he could not extend the pardoning power; and with a view of accomplishing the same end without violating the spirit of the law, he ordered that one of his own eyes should be put out and one of his son's.

Mr. Chairman, the object of inflicting penalties upon transgressors is not to wreak vengeance or to gratify malice or anything of that description, but there is a great end to be accomplished by doing it. Let us inquire for a moment what good arises from the fact of inflicting the penalties of the law upon transgressors. What good, for instance, will it do to inflict the penalty of the law upon a man convicted of the crime of murder? Will it bring back the dead to life? No, sir. Then, if it will not bring the dead back to life, what benefit will arise from executing the murderer? It may be said by some that it will prevent him from committing a similar crime, but I say that there is no more certainty that he would commit the crime again than that any other man would commit it. And, men are not to be executed for fear they may commit crime. Under an administration of that kind none would be safe.

But, sir, there are two grand objects to be secured by inflicting penalties upon violators of the law. The first is to sustain the confidence of the law-abiding that the Government will be maintained. No country can prosper, and no people can be happy, unless they have confidence that their Government will be sustained. We have had an exhibition of the necessity of the exercise of this duty during the late rebellion. It has often been proposed to engage in enterprises and improvements in different parts of the United States, but the objection was made, "Wait till the rebellion is put down; we do not know what may be the result of this great rebellion." I remember in my own immediate neighborhood there was a proposition to erect a woollen factory. It was believed that it would be an important enterprise and a profitable investment; but the uncertain condition of the country was such as to forbid men investing capital, and they would not do it. Who would build a house or plant an orchard, or plow his fields and sow his grain, if he had no assurance that he would be permitted to partake of the fruits of his industry? Who would engage in industrial pursuits if he had no confidence in the stability of the Government?

Strike down the confidence of the people in the stability of their Government, and progress and improvement will come to an end; in a word, the Government will come to an end, and wreck and ruin would be the result.

Now, there is no one thing that can be done for the welfare of the American people that will more thoroughly promote enterprise, improvements, and industry, than to convince the great mass of the people that the Government will be maintained, and that every hand lifted against the Government shall be palsied or stricken down. Make this impression deep and lasting, and no one thing, in my judgment, will be better calculated to promote the general prosperity and general welfare of the nation.

This I understand, then, to be the first grand object of inflicting the penalties of the law upon transgressors: to sustain the confidence of the loyal and law-abiding.

In the next place, the object is to give warning to the refractory. When the penalty of the law is inflicted on a transgressor, when a murderer, for instance, is executed, a voice goes out to all throughout the country, telling them that if they violate the law they shall suffer in like manner. These I understand to be the great objects of inflicting penalties upon those who transgress the laws of our country.

I said, a few moments ago, that I did not understand it to be necessary for the whole letter of the law to be inflicted in every instance. I hold punishment to be an evil; that all punishment is an evil; and whenever it can be dispensed with without injury to the public it ought to be dispensed with. Whenever the Executive of the United States, or the Executive of any State in the Union, can extend the pardoning power without injury to the general welfare, then he ought to do so. I hold it to be the universal rule, that when it can be done, and no injury inflicted upon the community or upon the country, then the pardoning power ought to be exercised. Those that are in prison, if they can be liberated without injury to society, ought to be liberated. Where no good can be secured by retaining them in prison, it will be an evil to keep them there; and where the evil of their punishment would be overbalanced by the evil resulting to the community from their escape, then the punishment should be inflicted.

Now, the impression upon my mind is that there should be a sufficient number of leading rebels from each of the States lately in rebellion against the United States Government arraigned for their treason, tried as the President suggests, and if found guilty they should suffer the penalty of the law. I would not say that all who have been in rebellion should thus suffer. No good could result from such a course, because of the fact that a few of the leaders in each State suffering the penalty of the law would secure the very same good to the people of the United States that the execution of all who had been in rebellion would secure to them. Suppose that every one of those who have been engaged in this rebellion should be tried and the full penalty of the law inflicted upon them, what good would result from that? It would simply say that the Government will be maintained, and the confidence of the law-abiding portion of the people as a matter of course would be strengthened by such a course. And it is true the refractory throughout the country would be warned, those who had a disposition to rebel against the Government would be warned of the fate that would await them should they thus act. These are the great ends to be obtained. But I understand that the trial and condemnation and execution of a few of the leaders in each of these States would secure the very same end, would have the very same tendency to strengthen the general confidence in the Government.

We all know that if there are no leaders there would be no rebellion, there can be no rebellion without leaders. I know the people of the South say that Mr. Davis, for instance, was only their servant; and that other individuals were simply carrying out their will; and that those men are no more responsible than they are.

Now I deny the truth of that assertion. I say that those men have been agitating this question for the last ten, fifteen, or twenty years. They have been threatening to dissolve the Union and to rebel against the Government for at least fifteen or twenty years. And they are the guilty ones; they are the leaders; they are the prime movers. Had it not been for perhaps a dozen men that might be selected from among those who were leading rebels, there would have been no rebellion. I presume we all know this to be the fact. Select some ten or fifteen, perhaps not so many, perhaps a few more, from the various States lately in rebellion, and there would have been no rebellion. And if it is understood by the people of this Union that the leaders of a rebellion shall die, there never will be another rebellion. Just let that fact be fixed in the minds of the people, that all who lead in such an enterprise as this shall suffer, shall die for it, and rebellions would become very scarce throughout this country.

But if all those who have been engaged in rebellion against the Government are to be pardoned, if the entire number of the rebels are to be released from the penalty of the law, and are to be permitted to enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens again, what would that proclaim to those who are to come in the future? What truth would it proclaim to those who are to come after us? Would it not be saying to them, "You may engage in a rebellion; you may try the experiment; if you fail you will be pardoned, and be permitted to enjoy all the rights of citizenship again; you will only incur the difficulty and expense of trying the experiment, and if you fail, it will be only a failure, but will produce no great harm to yourselves."

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that all the men concerned in the late rebellion should be the objects of the pardoning power of the chief Executive; then, if in the course of a few years, other dissatisfied men should undertake a second rebellion against the Government, with what face could the Government attempt to inflict the penalty of the law upon such conspirators or rebels? If the Government should, in this aggravated case, this monstrous instance, set an example that the leaders in rebellion and treason shall go unpunished, how could the Government, with any degree of propriety, inflict punishment upon new transgressors of the same class? If the participants in the recent terrible war upon the Government be exempted from all responsibility for their crimes, future traitors, meeting with similar failure in their efforts, could with great propriety say to the Government, "Former criminals, whose guilt was more aggravated than ours, suffered the infliction of no penalty, and we expected, as a matter of course, that the Government would extend to us the same lenity."

But, sir, let the penalty of the law be inflicted, and confidence in the administration of justice will be strengthened, subordination to law will be fostered, and prosperity will bless our nation from ocean to ocean.

It is sometimes said, Mr. Chairman, that Christianity requires that the guilty shall be pardoned or forgiven. In the newspapers that advocate the pardon of all these men I sometimes see it urged that the Almighty forgives the vilest of the vile; that He pardons all; but the man who offers this argument overlooks or forgets one important fact: the God of the universe would not, and I will say could not, pardon one sinner till a great sacrifice, a vast atonement, had been made. The Son of God suffered and died upon the cross so as to render it possible for the great Ruler of the universe to forgive those who had rebelled against His government. I affirm that God would not and could not pardon one rebel against His government without this great atonement. It is true that the penalty was not inflicted in accordance with the letter of the law; but the spirit of the law was fulfilled, securing the same ends that would have been attained by inflicting literally the penalty of the law.

So, I affirm, when the Government of the United States has carried out in spirit the law for the punishment of treason by inflicting the penalty upon a sufficient number of the leading traitors—and I will not pretend to determine how many would constitute a sufficient number—then the Executive of the United States can consistently extend his pardon to the less conspicuous and active criminals. In this manner the confidence of the law-abiding will be sustained, while the refractory will be warned; and in this manner pardon may, without injurious consequences, be extended to those offenders whose guilt is less aggravated.

In the commencement of my remarks I said that it was not on account of hatred to the South that I urged that the penalty of the law should be inflicted. I know that it is a very common thing to impute to us hatred of the South. Now, sir, where is the man in this assembly, or in this country, who hates the South? Why should we hate its pleasant climate, its fertile valleys, and flowery plains? No, sir, we do not hate the South.

But they say it is the institutions of the South; they have used these words for the last twenty years. We have been opposed, we have been told, to the institutions of the South; and the word has always been used in the plural. As one, I do not hate the institutions of the South.

Sir, I frankly say that I have from my boyhood hated one institution from the South, if it can be called an institution, and that is the institution of slavery which prevailed there.

I have no feeling of hatred to southern men. There are many good and loyal men in the South. I honor and respect them, and desire their welfare and happiness. I have no doubt a great many in the southern States were led into rebellion by the influence of others; they were deceived, and led by deception to do that which they would not otherwise have done. I have no feelings of enmity to them. The leaders in this great crime have not my hatred. They have my compassion and my pity. I hold the good of the nation demands they should suffer, and I think I express this sentiment with the same feeling a judge has upon the bench when he pronounces sentence of the law against a transgressor. He does not do it because he takes pleasure in the death of the transgressor, but from a conviction that the welfare of mankind demands it. On this ground we demand this penalty shall be imposed upon these transgressors, not from hatred to them, but from a love to the nation; not that we love them less, but the country more.

I acknowledge I have a feeling of hatred for an institution that authorizes one man to make a slave of another man; that authorizes him to rob him of everything that makes life dear; of the right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness; of the right to wife and children. I hate that institution be it found where it may.

Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with a southern man who has been raised under that institution; but for a man raised in the northern States, the free States, who has been permitted to read and study and investigate, who indorses the institution of slavery, I have a feeling of hatred. I know it is said by some to be wrong to hate a man. I find in reading the good Book that God hated the Nicolaitans. I say in a certain sense I hate the man who had an opportunity of having light in his pathway, and deliberately indorses the right of one man to enslave his fellow-man. If I hate any man, I hate him.

I recall the remark of one of our statesmen, made many years ago in this Capitol. When a northern man got up in his place and apologized for the institution of slavery, Mr. Randolph, pointing his finger at him, said he envied neither his head nor his heart. I say the same thing; if a man from the North, who has had the privileges of freedom, rises and apologizes for slavery, I envy neither his head nor his heart.

There is another branch of the subject I will refer to and then close. It is said these men claim the right of revolution. An honorable gentleman some time back said upon this floor they were to some extent justified on the eternal principle of revolution. He did not say boldly they were justified in rebellion, but he undertook to excuse rebellion upon the ground that men have the right to revolution. I admit the right of revolution under certain circumstances. There are circumstances which will justify men in rising in rebellion against the Government. The circumstance which I suppose would justify men in engaging in revolution is this: when their natural rights are invaded, and when they cannot regain possession of them by civil means.

But, sir, did any of these circumstances exist in the case of those States that engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States? Were their natural rights invaded? Had they no opportunity to recover their rights by civil means? I am not informed that any man has ever claimed that the United States had ever trampled upon one of their natural rights; not one, sir. I have not met the first man that claims that the rights of the citizens of those southern States were invaded by the General Government.

Again, it is sometimes said that our fathers rebelled against the Government of Great Britain; and that is cited to justify the rebels in revolting or rebelling against the Government of the United States; but is there any similarity existing between the circumstances under which the States rebelled against this Government and those under which our fathers rebelled against the Government of Great Britain? Our fathers had no representation in the government that was exercised over them. They had no voice in that Government. They had petitioned time and again, but in vain; it would procure no alleviation of their sufferings. So there was no alternative but rebellion.

Now, the southern States had representation in this Government. They not only had a large representation, but a much larger representation than justice would have given them. But not only that, but the South had control of at least two departments of the Federal Government at the time they rebelled. They had a majority of their friends at least in each House of Congress; and not only that, but they had a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court on their side; so that they might have controlled this Government for an indefinite time, if they had not attempted to revolutionize.

The only real ground that has been assigned, as I understand it, upon which the rebellion was inaugurated, was the fact that an anti-slavery man had been elected President of the United States. That was the ostensible and real ground upon which the rebellion was predicated and justified. But that was not a sufficient justification. We could not for a moment yield the right of a minority to rebel because the majority would not suffer them to rule. Calling themselves Democrats, the great Democratic party of the United States, they rebelled against the Government because the majority would not permit a minority to rule!

But it is said, as an apology for this act of rebellion, that they were sincere—they believed that they were doing right when they engaged in rebellion. Now, sir, that the ignorant portion of the people in the States that engaged in rebellion may have thought that they were right I will not pretend to dispute. But for men that called themselves statesmen, that professed to understand the principles of government—for such men to seriously maintain that they had a constitutional right to secede from the General Government is just a little more than I can believe. The very idea of States having a right to secede is too absurd to be entertained by statesmen. If a man takes the ground that one State has a right to secede from the Federal Government, then it follows that another State may do the same, and a third and a fourth, and so on until all secede. And if all have the right to secede at pleasure, of course there is no Government that is stable or permanent—none upon which we may rely.

And if a State has a right to secede, why not a county, and a town? And thus the principle might be carried out until you come down to an individual, who might claim that he had the right to withdraw from the Government and stand independent and alone. And if I remember correctly, this was the ground taken by one John A. Murrel some years ago, when he asked no favor of the Government, but demanded to be let alone and to be allowed to take care of himself, claiming that the strong had a right to triumph over the weak. Hence, if a man takes the ground that one State has a right to secede, I see no stopping-place until every man has a right to do the same; and then all government is gone, society is destroyed, and anarchy rules.

Therefore, I repeat that I cannot believe that any intelligent man ever believed that the States had a right under the Constitution of the United States thus to secede and disintegrate the Government of the nation.

But, sir, suppose that these men were sincere—admit for the sake of the argument—should they be screened from punishment on that account? If you take the ground that every man who believes he has a right to violate the law of the land may do so, you will have every violator of law coming up to your courts of justice and boldly proclaiming that he believed he had a right to do just what he did, that he had a right to kill, or to rob, or to commit whatever crime he committed. If men are to be excused upon that ground, there will be no security. Old John Brown, I presume, was just as sincere in what he did as any man in the rebel States, and as honest, too, and yet I hold that he was executed rightfully. I know this sentiment will come in conflict with the sentiments of many whom I love and respect, but I cannot help it. John Brown struck a blow at the very foundations of civil society, and if he could be permitted to strike such a blow, every other man would be allowed to do the same thing. But, sir, the blow that John Brown struck was aimed at slavery, and therefore, in my opinion, his crime was comparatively light. The blow struck by those who rebelled against the Government was infinitely heavier than the blow struck by John Brown, and that blow was aimed, not at slavery, but aimed at freedom and in defense of slavery. It was, therefore, an infinitely greater crime than John Brown's was; and if John Brown died righteously, how can these men escape who have committed a much greater crime?

Again, let me inquire how many of John Brown's associates were pardoned. I confess that I am not certainly informed whether any one of them was pardoned or not.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Not one.

Mr. HENDERSON. My friend says not one, and I presume it is the fact that not one of them was pardoned. Then, sir, how can these people in the rebel States expect that their traitors against the Government shall all be pardoned when they struck down poor old John Brown and all his followers? There is no consistency in it. They condemned John Brown and executed him and his associates in crime, and I hold that they did right. And at the same time, I claim that the leaders in this great rebellion are infinitely more guilty than he, and that they ought to suffer the same measure which they meted out to him. Then, sir, when this is done, when a sufficient number from each of these States have been brought before the tribunals, tried, convicted, and executed, then our Government will be sustained, and the confidence of the loyal people will be reestablished, our country will go on prospering and flourishing, while

"Old John Brown's body lies a moldering in the grave, And his soul goes marching on."

[Applause.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. KELSO. In the consideration of this subject, our first duty is to ascertain the present status of the rebel States, to determine which seems to be a difficult matter even with some of our greatest statesmen.

No reasonable and loyal man, I think, will now contend, as did the rebels five years ago, that those States, by the mere act of secession, became foreign and independent governments. Those who advocate that doctrine now are five years behind the rebels themselves, who now contend that those States are in the Union and have been all the time. I shall, therefore, regard it as a conceded fact that those so-called States have all the time de jure composed a geographical and political part of the United States, and now de facto constitute such a part. The only question, therefore, to be determined is, whether they are de facto States—governing partners in the Union—or merely United States Territories subject to the disposition of Congress. This leads us to consider, what is a State?

Politically speaking, a State is a body of people united for the purpose of government, and occupying a portion of country comprised within certain described limits. The land alone does not constitute the State; neither do the people alone, nor do both together, unless the people are united for governmental purposes. A State is a unit, and isolated inhabitants acting independently of each other cannot form such a unit.

This I regard as a correct general description of a State, and to constitute one of the United States, such State must be bona fide united with the other States for mutual protection. It must be constantly yielding its just proportion to the support of the General Government, which is only an embodiment or blending of the powers yielded by the several States, just as the light which illuminates a vast hall is the embodiment or blending of the lights which emanate from many individual lamps.

If a State ceases to blend its powers with those of the other States, it ceases, at the same time, to have any part or lot, as an active, governing partner in that united power or General Government; just as a lamp ceases to have any part or lot in illuminating the hall when it ceases to blend its rays with those of the other lamps.

Now, some of the members of this Union did, by secession, cease to blend their powers with those of the other States and, as a matter of course, they ceased to be governing partners in the Union, though the authority of the General Government continued to extend over them just as the united light from the lamps still burning illuminates every part of the hall even after some of the lamps have ceased to emit their rays.

The General Government was not diminished in extent by the defection of some of its members, though it certainly was in absolute power, just as the light in the hall is diminished in intensity, but not in extent, by the going out of the lamps.

The States that have thus ceased to be active partners in the Union have necessarily ceased to exist as States, or they have fallen into a protracted catalepsy, in which their functions are suspended while their vitality still remains. How long this political catalepsy can continue without terminating in political death I do not know, but I suppose our great and good Executive and the other advocates of the cataleptic doctrine could inform us. My own opinion is that those States, as such, have ceased to exist. They have, as I conceive, violated the essential conditions of their existence as States of this Union by refusing for nearly five years to have anything to do in our Government; and by waging a cruel war upon us, they violated all the stipulations of the contract into which they entered when they became States. Acting in their State capacity they disunited themselves from the Union, and having failed to sustain themselves as independent States, they have necessarily ceased to exist at all as States, for no State can possibly exist as such without being united with this Union, or independent of it, and they are neither.

Besides this, we find that at least one of the essential elements of a State has been destroyed or withdrawn from them. We have seen that a State is an organized body of people, and that without organization the people cannot constitute a State; and as the organizations were destroyed in the rebel States they perished as States, and their remaining elements returned to their original or territorial condition, just as water ceases to exist as such when one of its essential elements, hydrogen, for instance, is withdrawn.

Besides the destruction of the governmental organizations in those States, the people composing those organization have become dead in law, and thus another essential element of a State is destroyed.

Whether we consider the rebels as traitors or as alien enemies, they have forfeited their lives, and though they have not perished literally, they certainly have in law, and they can have no life, politically, until it is given them by the Government to which their lives have been forfeited.

If all the people of one of the States should perish, literally, would that State still exist? For instance, if all the people of South Carolina should sink, as they ought to, would the uninhabited land constitute a State? If so, would it be loyal, or disloyal? If the land of South Carolina should sink, as it ought to, would the fugitive people who might escape, still form a State? If so, what State would it be, and where would it be situated?

The people have not perished literally, it is true, but they have, as we have seen, perished in law, which is just the same as literal death, so far as it affects the existence of the States. The land remains and the debris of the fallen State structures, just as the ground remains where a house has once stood, and the debris of the house may still cover that ground, but since it has fallen to pieces it can no longer be regarded as a house, nor can it perform the functions of a house until it is reconstructed.

So fully have the so-called rebel States become territorial in their condition, that Congress may form from them as many or as few new States as may be thought best, totally ignoring the names and boundaries of the defunct States. As a general rule, however, it would be better to give the same names and boundaries to the new States as were possessed by the old. As to South Carolina, however, I would like her name to be abolished were it practicable, and her territory divided between Massachusetts and southwest Missouri. We would soon take the aristocracy out of her.

I believe that all correct reasoners will arrive at the same conclusion I have in regard to the present status of the rebel States. The rebels, however, since they have been whipped, and many good loyal men, think otherwise; but as they have, as a general rule, resolved not to be convinced, I will not delay time by any further arguments. They contend that since the Constitution and laws of the United States do not provide for the withdrawal of any State from this Union, nor for its self-destruction, such withdrawal and such destruction are impossible.

This is a beautiful theory and would become universally popular did facts only bear it out. By it we could prove that Lincoln was not murdered. The attempt being unconstitutional and illegal was null and void and the end unaccomplished. The same could be said in regard to the half million of our brave soldiers that were slain in the war, but who, according to this theory, were not killed at all. In a word, since the Constitution does not authorize any crime or any evil, any attempt to commit or produce either would be null and void and the result unattained. All crimes and all evils must therefore be imaginary, and we may at once enter into the joys of the millennium without further delay, and without asking the Almighty any odds.

Facts, however, stubborn facts, are against this theory. The facts are that, in direct violation of the Constitution and the laws, men have committed murder, suicide, and other crimes. Individuals have perished contrary to law. The blow that caused their death was not rendered "null and void" by being unconstitutional and illegal, neither was the death-blow which rebellion gave to certain States of this Union rendered "null and void" merely because it was unconstitutional and illegal.

If the seceded States have been de facto members of this Union all the time, they have, of course, had a right to vote for President and Vice President of the United States, to send Senators and Representatives to this Congress, and to participate in all the transactions of our Government; and they will continue to possess this right during any future rebellion which they may see fit to inaugurate. If treason in the past has deprived them of no rights, powers, nor privileges, it could not in the future deprive them of any of those things. They need, then, have no fear. A premium is placed upon rebellion. Let them then renew the war as soon as they please. They can lose nothing, and may gain much. If they succeed, and establish permanently their independence, they will, in addition to independence, possess all the advantages of members of this Union; for their independence, being "unconstitutional," will be "null and void." If they fail, they will still possess all the rights and privileges of loyal States. Their generals will be made Governors of States, and presidents of railroads, colleges, &c., and their leaders will generally be distinguished by their "instinctive frankness and honor." Let them understand that this is the manner in which "traitors" are to be hung and "treason" made "odious;" and what more could they ask?

If the theory which we are considering be correct, then we are the most cruel of tyrants and usurpers, for we have been and are still doing in the South what the General Government has no power to do in the States.

If instead of eleven States, all the States had, on the same day, seceded and set up independent governments, if each had refused to aid in electing a President and Vice President, and had refused to send Senators and Representatives to Congress, if each State had thus refused to have any part or lot in the Union, and had each seized all the Government property within its limits—if all the United States officers and employés, finding themselves unsupported, had gone home, where would the Union be of which all these States would still be "unimpaired members?" If rebellion in eleven States cannot destroy their membership as States in this Union, it could not destroy the membership of three times eleven States.

Every vestige of the Union might thus be destroyed, and yet, according to this theory, the Union would still be unimpaired; and I again ask, where would that Union be and what would it be? If under such circumstances it would be merely in a catalepsy, I fear the attack would be a very serious one.

We thus see that the theory of State immortality will not bear the test of reason and of facts, and we will therefore leave this part of the subject and proceed to consider the best mode of reconstructing into real States those territories which, as we have seen, have resulted from the suicidal destruction of the so-called rebel States.

At the very threshold of this subject, we are met by two questions of vast importance, neither of which have yet been answered: 1. What shall be done with the rebels? 2. What shall be done with the negroes?

The first of these questions would be easily answered if we had a hell to put our rebels in, as the Almighty had for His rebels; but as we lack that one little convenience, we should take that course which will best secure justice to them and safety to the nation.

Strict justice, according to the laws of all nations, would require that the rebels all suffer an ignominious death; but since the President of the United States has granted them their lives and the liberty of their persons, I will not now question their right to enjoy what has thus been given them. To grant them more than these, however, would at present be inconsistent with the safety of the loyal people of the South, and indeed of the whole nation, and I deny that the President or any one else has the right or authority to favor rebels at the expense of loyal people.

By the laws of nations, the rebels have forfeited every vestige of right and title to their property, which is now, to all intents and purposes, vested in the United States; and once so vested I do not think that it can be divested, except by the people themselves, or by their Representatives in Congress.

Four billion dollars of this property may justly be regarded as funds in the United States Treasury for the payment of the public debt; and to give this vast sum to the aristocratic leaders of the rebellion would be conferring upon them a dangerous power, and would besides be indirectly taking the money from the pockets of loyal men, who would then be compelled, by taxation, to pay that debt. This would be very unjust, and I do not think that the President of the United States has any more right to give this property to the rebels than he has to give them any other property belonging to the people.

When the rebels inaugurated an unjust war against us, they knew what they were doing and what they were risking; and with their eyes open, they staked their lives and their fortunes upon the result. They expected to gain all or lose all. They neither expected to ask nor to receive any favors from the United States, and I assure you that they had no intention to grant any favors to loyal men in the event that victory decided in their (the rebels') favor. Does any man here suppose that if the rebellion had succeeded a Federal soldier could have gone South and regained possession of his property? Even as it is, it is a very dangerous thing for a Union man to return to his home in the South. Let us, then, confiscate the property of the rebels, or at least so much of it as will pay our entire war debt. This could be done without reducing any of the wealthy rebels to less than $10,000 worth of property.

This would be but a trifling indemnity for the past; but it is, alas! all that we can ever hope to receive. Can the rebels ever restore the untold millions of property which they have destroyed? Can they restore to innocence and happiness the thousands whom their unholy war has lured or driven into the paths of vice? Can they bring joy to the hearts of the millions of widows and orphans whose loved ones they have slain? Can they restore to health and vigor the six hundred thousand mutilated forms that have returned, more wrecks, from the field of battle? Can they restore reason to the poor maniacs whom they drove to insanity by their unheard-of cruelty? Can they reanimate the four hundred thousand cold forms of our heroic dead? Can they reclothe in living flesh the sixty thousand wasted skeletons that they tortured to death by cold and hunger in the Libby, and at Salisbury, Andersonville, and Belle Isle?

Besides confiscating their property, I would disfranchise the rebels until they could show an unspotted record of loyalty for at least five years. This I would do, not so much as a punishment to them, as a security to the loyal people of the South and of the nation. If the rebels are allowed to vote, their ballots will be cast for our destruction, as their bullets have heretofore been, and it may be with more fatal effect. Can any one doubt this who has any knowledge of the bitter hatred which still exists among the rebels toward our Government and all its friends? Have the rebels ever admitted that they were wrong? Have they surrendered their treasonable doctrines of secession and State rights? Do they not laud as heroes those who have murdered the greatest number of Union men? Do they not regard their dead as sainted martyrs? Do they not sullenly show in a thousand ways that they still cling to the hope of ultimate success? Has treason made them more loyal? Has war made them more friendly? Has murder rendered them more humane? Has perjury rendered them more honest? Have all the horrible crimes of which they are guilty rendered them better men and more worthy of our confidence? One year ago, and were they not butchering, scathing, tearing out the hearts of our fathers and brothers, or torturing them to death by the most unheard-of cruelties? And now, with hands all covered with gore and wearing the very garments which they tore from the cold forms of our murdered dead, they have the effrontery to ask equal rights and privileges with the brave defenders of our country; and oh! shame! they are met and embraced as brothers by thousands from the North who have always claimed to be loyal.

These traitors may be "high-toned gentlemen;" they may be possessed of an "instinctive frankness and honor," but I cannot so see them. I see them now as I saw them when they were burning our homes, when they were driving our wives and our little ones out in the winter storms, when they were butchering our gray-haired sires, tearing off their bloody scalps, roasting their feet, or burning out their tongues.

As a southern man, I speak in behalf of the loyal men of the South. Without a murmur we sacrificed all we possessed. We fought during four long years, and thousands of our bravest and best went down amid the thunder clouds of battle. Our families were reduced to want, and many sank under the weight of their sufferings, and the wild winds of winter are now waiving over their lowly beds.

We do not ask that the rebels be punished for all this. We are willing to forgive them; but, in the name of Heaven, we do ask for protection, or, at least, for the privilege of protecting ourselves. As to Missouri, we have but little to ask. There we have got the rebels under; and, by the Eternal, we mean to keep them under. There are, however, millions of loyal people just as true as ourselves, in other portions of the South, who are not so fortunate as we are. Their lives are never safe, and they will soon be crushed if the rebels are restored to power. For them I plead. By every principle of humanity, by its solemn pledges, by its sacred honor, this Government is bound to protect them; and this, in my opinion, can only be done by holding the so-called rebel States as United States Territories, and governing them as such until the loyal people, unintimidated by the rebels, can form and present republican constitutions and apply for admission as States. I believe that Congress has full authority to determine who shall vote in those Territories, and it is bound to see that all the loyal citizens are allowed a voice in the conventions that meet to frame the new State constitutions. The rebels should have no part nor lot in the formation of those constitutions, and their restoration to the elective franchise should devolve upon the loyal State governments after such have been established. In this way the safety of the loyal people can be secured, peace and order established, and slavery forever abolished.

But what shall be done with the negroes? I have sufficiently answered this question already by including them among the citizens of the Territories, concerning which I have been speaking. Of course all the loyal citizens should have a voice in the formation of the new State constitution; and if they were so unwise as to insert the word white in those constitutions I would have nothing more to say; while if none but whites were allowed a voice in framing those constitutions, I would not consider them republican in form if they ostracized any citizen on account of race or color. If none but blacks were allowed a voice in the framing of those constitutions, and they should ostracize any citizen on account of race or color, I would also reject their constitutions as not republican in form.

I am prepared to be met here by the thousand and one hackneyed objections to negro suffrage. These objections have been often and ably refuted in this House, and by the loyal press throughout the nation; and I do not now propose to notice them in detail. The only one, indeed, which is worthy of notice is the want of intelligence among the negroes. This is a reasonable, but by no means an insurmountable objection. The same objection could, with equal justice, be urged against four fifths of the whites of the South. Some evils would, no doubt, attend the enfranchisement of four million ignorant blacks and half a million equally ignorant whites, none of whom have ever been accustomed to think or act for themselves; yet those evils would be comparatively unimportant, and would soon disappear when those masses become more enlightened.

The experience of the past proves that the dangers we have to fear arise more from the corrupt principles of those who are intelligent than from the ignorance of those who are not. The most intelligent classes of the South were the most uniformly disloyal. Intelligence among the people is of vast importance, but dearly have we learned that pure and unswerving loyalty is of a thousand times more importance. The Union did not save the southern whites through their intelligence, nor did it lose the blacks through their ignorance. The whites with all their intelligence were traitors, the blacks with all their ignorance were loyal; and thus we have at least one instance in which the negroes, with all their disadvantages, have shown themselves worthy of trust; and I, for one, am willing to trust them again. They have shown themselves sufficiently intelligent to be, as a class, sober, honest, industrious, loyal, and brave; and this, among American citizens, is the most important kind of intelligence. They know enough to cast bullets with judgment, and I have no doubt but that they would soon learn to cast ballots with equal judgment. A very little intelligence is sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong, loyalty and treason, and whoever knows enough to do that is intelligent enough to fight and to vote. The philosopher who can explain the composition of gunpowder and the chemical and mechanical powers brought into action in the use of fire-arms, is very little superior in battle to the loyal and brave, but unlettered rustic who merely knows enough to clap one eye shut, take deliberate aim, and kill his rebel. The philosopher who has ransacked whole libraries only knows enough to cast his vote for the right; the rustic, guided only by the promptings of an honest and loyal heart, knows enough to do the same.

Somebody must vote in the South, and for my part I would rather it should be the loyal party, though they are mostly ignorant and black.

Of course they would commit some blunders at first, but they would soon learn. Practice in voting, as in all other things, makes perfect, and there can be no perfection without practice. If you wish them to learn the art of swimming will you forbid them the use of water until they have become expert swimmers? Will you refuse them the use of books until they have become good readers? Will you refuse them the use of pens until they have become good writers? Will you refuse them the use of instruments until they have become good musicians? And can you, with any more reason, refuse them the use of the ballot until they have become good voters? How can you expect them or anybody else to learn when you withhold from them the only means by which they could learn?

If, however, you must have a suffrage qualified by intelligence, fix your standard, apply it impartially to all without regard to race or color, and I will not so seriously object, though it would, at this time, cut off nineteen twentieths of the loyal people of the South, both black and white.

I have thus far considered the subject of impartial suffrage in the southern territories merely with reference to its practicability. I shall now proceed to consider it with reference to its justness and its necessity.

In the first place, then, though we may deny that the loyal blacks have any right to the elective franchise, we must nevertheless grant it to them in order thus to protect the loyal whites, whom all admit we are bound to protect. From the best accounts I can obtain, the loyal whites constitute less than one twentieth part of the entire population of these territories, and less than one twelfth of the white population. If, then, we disfranchise the loyal blacks, what hope will remain to the loyal whites after the Federal troops are withdrawn and the rebels restored to power? I venture the prediction that at the end of one year, there would not be a hundred thorough Union men in the South that would dare to own their principles. They would be killed, driven out, or forced to succumb to the overwhelming tide of treason. This is the opinion of all my Union friends in the South with whom I am corresponding; it is the opinion of my old friend, the Delegate from Louisiana; it is the opinion of my colleagues here, and it is the opinion of all who know the real spirit of the rebels.

It would be folly to think of putting the governments of the South into the hands, exclusively, of the loyal whites. There are not enough of them who can read and write to fill the offices, and even if there were, their governments would be quickly swamped by the exasperated millions of rebels on one side, and the equally formidable hosts of justly incensed slaves on the other.

It would be still greater folly to think of always governing the South by military power. We could not bear the expense, and the longer we keep our armies there the worse the rebels hate us. Soon that burning hatred would burst out in war more terrible than has yet been known. Many of the rebels do not deny that they intend to renew the struggle at no distant day. Some of the nearest relatives I have on earth are rebels, and they refuse to correspond with me, on the ground that we will soon be again arrayed against each other in a more bloody struggle than that through which we have just passed. Having betrayed our faith with the loyal blacks in this struggle, we could hardly count on their aid in the next. If they did not help our enemies, they would be likely to help themselves, and who could blame them?

Thus we see that necessity compels us to give the elective franchise to the loyal blacks; and we will now consider whether the eternal laws of liberty and justice do not require the same.

If the negroes are men, they are entitled to the rights of men. If it be true that "all men" in regard to their rights "are born equal," then whatever is the inalienable right of one man or one race of men is undeniably the inalienable right of all men and all races. If it be true that we should do unto others as we would that they should do unto us, and if we would not that the African race should deprive us of any of our inalienable rights, how dare we, as a Christian people, do so unto them? And how can we hope for God's blessing while we continue to violate this His solemn commandment? Have not the judgments of the last five years been sufficient to teach us wisdom, coming upon us, as all admit they have, in direct consequence of the terrible crime of slavery? For my part, I am satisfied with our punishments, and am willing to do justice to all men, even to the despised negroes, though in so doing I must do violence to prejudices, old almost as my life, and strong as my innate passions.

Though I never was a pro-slavery man, yet reared up in a slave State, and by ultra pro-slavery parents, I unconsciously imbibed many of their prejudices.

Besides the arguments already advanced, the gratitude, the plighted faith of our nation binds us to bestow upon the loyal blacks all the rights of freemen. In the darkest hour of our country's need they never faltered, though their fidelity to us subjected them to unheard-of outrages and to death in a thousand terrible forms. Our poor starved prisoners, escaping from the rebel slaughter-pens, found no friend but the poor, despised negro. He shared with them his own scant fare, and in the darkness of the night led them through swamps and over mountains to the camps of their friends. When the war hung in even balance, we called upon these poor slaves to help us, and promised in return to make them free. No danger, no obstacle daunted them. By tens of thousands they poured into our ranks, and soon a hundred thousand threw themselves upon the foe. The scale soon turned in our favor. Fort Wagner, Fort Pillow, Port Hudson, Petersburg, a score of battle-fields the most bloody and the most glorious, all speak of their valor. As rushes the mighty avalanche from the Alpine heights, so rushed they amid the hot smoke and the thunders of the battle upon the traitor foe. On, on, through trenches, over ramparts, up to the very mouths of the cannons that moved them down, they bore our flag to victory, while thousands, from whose bosoms the hot blood was gushing, turned their glaring eyes upward to that "brave old flag," and poured out their last breath in cheers for victory and liberty. Poor, brave, deluded men! They thought they were free. Our country had promised them freedom, and even in dying they were happy because they thought it was true. They did not know that the very people for whom they were dying would have shamelessly violated their solemn promise and turned them over helpless into the hands of their enraged and cruel masters. It would have been better had they all died. Alas for those who still live! They come home war-worn and weary to find that their fond hope of liberty was only a delusive dream.

They are greeted with, "We are done with you niggers; now lay down your arms and either leave the country, or go to work for your old rebel masters. This is a white man's country, and you have no rights here which a white man is bound to respect. We promised you freedom, it is true, and we have bargained with your old masters not to call you slaves in the future; but excepting the name, your condition is not likely to be any better. Your old masters are enraged and will wreak their vengeance upon your defenseless heads, but then you are black." Oh, God! if it be such a crime to be black, why hast thou made them thus?

Slavery is said to be abolished. In name it is, but not in reality. Of right the negroes always were free; but what good did the right do them when freedom itself was withheld? So with the name of freedom now, what good will that do them if the substance is withheld? They have been proclaimed free, but has that made them so? Were I to see you drowning, and were to proclaim you free from that danger, and then leave you without help, what good would my proclamation do you? Were I to find you hungry and cold, and were merely to proclaim that you were clothed and fed, would that proclamation be real food and clothing?

It would certainly be as real as the liberty which we have bestowed upon the slaves. We have only deprived them of the protection of their owners, who had the same interest in their safety that they had in the safety of their horses or oxen. Now they have the protection of no one, and are the slaves of all their enemies. When the negro was an ox, he had the protection of an ox. Now that he is half man and half ox, he is regarded as a monster, and receives no protection at all. Does not every southern breeze still bring to our ears the sound of the lash, the baying of the bloodhound, the cries of the slave, and the screams of murder? And will not this condition of things continue until the negroes are either annihilated or driven to terrible deeds of desperation. It certainly will, unless we put them in a condition to defend their own rights by giving them the elective franchise. Let us then by a solemn act of Congress declare the so-called rebel States to be mere Territories. Let us then call upon all the loyal people of those Territories, and none but the loyal, to form constitutions, republican in form, and apply for admission as States of this Union. The power being thus established in the hands of the loyal people, they would be able to keep the rebels in subjection, and we could recall our armies. Emigration, sure of protection, would pour into those States, and soon the element of treason would be swallowed up and lost.

In conclusion, I will say that I hope all the loyal States will soon erase from their statutes those disgraceful distinctions which many of them still make among their citizens on account of color. Of my own State I am truly proud. She is coming forth as a giant from the thunder clouds of war, and is free. She is educating her freedmen with reference to giving them the elective franchise at no distant day. I hope the other States will do likewise, and that we may all live to see our redeemed country glorious among the nations, as indeed—

"The land of the free and the home of the brave."

[Applause in the galleries.]

And then, on motion of Mr. ECKLEY, (at twenty minutes to ten o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 8, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I rise to present the certificate of election of Hon. JOHN POOL as a Senator from the State of North Carolina, for the term ending March 4, 1867. I owe it to the Senate and to Mr. POOL, as well as to myself, to state that he was, and is, and always has been, a devoted friend of the Union. He was a Union candidate for Governor of the State of North Carolina in 1860, before there was any imminent danger of secession. He canvassed the State, and opposed the secession movement by every means in his power to the very last moment. After the ordinance of secession was passed he retired to private life, and refused to take any part whatever in political affairs, even to vote in local elections, for two years. When the Union men of North Carolina commenced a peace movement in order to embarrass the rebellion, he threw himself into the movement and drew down upon himself both the anger and the persecution of the rebel authorities and the sympathizers with the rebellion. In 1864, when peace meetings were being held by the Union men of North Carolina, and were sometimes suppressed by the military authority of the rebels, and arrests were made under the proclamation of Governor Vance, he threw himself firmly into the opposition to those acts of the rebellion, and in favor of the peace meetings and the peace candidates. He took an active part in running Union or peace candidates for the Legislature of North Carolina, and consented himself to become a candidate for that purpose, in order to embarrass the movements of the rebellion. He introduced resolutions into the State Senate for the appointment of commissioners to treat with the United States for peace, and urged their passage, and came within two votes of succeeding in carrying them through the State Senate. From the beginning, during the whole rebellion, and since, he has done all in his power to sustain the cause of the Union. After the war of blood was over, he became actively engaged in favor of the reconstruction of the loyal State government of North Carolina. He was elected to the State convention for that purpose, and advocated the passage of the resolution annulling and declaring void from the beginning the act of secession and all things growing out of it. Under such circumstances has he been elected to the Senate of the United States.

As I said in the beginning, I deem it due to the Senate and to him and to myself, in rising to present his credentials as a Senator, to make this statement of his character as a devoted friend of the Government of the United States. I ask that the credentials, for the present, lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of J. E. Johnson, who prays Congress that the homestead law and all preemption laws of the United States, except such as are provided in the Freedmen's Bureau bill now pending before Congress, shall be suspended for the period of ten years, and he further prays that warrants for three hundred and twenty acres of land be issued to all soldiers, their widows, or heirs, who enlisted for three years prior to July 23, 1863, and who did not accept of the veteran bounty. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I also present a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, praying Congress to establish certain mail routes and to pass a law declaring the Des Moines river and Turkey river in that State, so far as it runs between the town of El Dorado, in Fayette county, and the junction of the Volga with the Turkey river, to be not navigable streams. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas in favor of a grant to that State for the use of common schools of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections on the Indian reservations or an equivalent thereto from the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY. I present a memorial of twelve citizens of Stafford county, Virginia, setting forth that they have always been loyal and true to the United States Government; that during the occupation of that county by the Federal forces they furnished divers supplies to the Army. They pray that Congress will, at an early date, grant such needful legislation as will enable them to audit their accounts, and to provide compensation for them either now or at such time as Congress shall deem proper. As a kindred matter has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask that this memorial be referred to that committee.

It was so referred.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the taxes upon sales of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Dr. William Schmoele, praying for the suspension or repeal of the homestead act, and for the passage of a law by which the price of our public lands be graduated and the minimum price fixed at five or six dollars per acre, and that the amount thus realized be dedicated to the payment of the national debt; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to present the petition of David Burdick, of West Milton, in Wisconsin, dated the 3d of February, 1866, in which he respectfully requests the Senate and House of Representatives to spend no more time in discussing the theory whether the rebellious States are in or out of the Union, and that we spend no more time in talking of amendments to the Constitution, for it will take a long time to secure such amendments, and, if made as ample and pure as could be made by angels, an element exists among traitors that would jump over any constitution, as in the case of the late rebellion; and that we immediately use our power to protect the loyal from oppression and put a stop to the shedding of innocent blood. I am not in a situation which enables me to say exactly that I indorse the whole of this petition, but I present it, and move that it be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial of citizens of Massachusetts, in which they set forth that the Constitution of the United States prescribes that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government; and they entreat Congress, in the execution of that power, to proceed to secure a republican form of government, which, in the opinion of these petitioners, is a realization of the principles of the Declaration of Independence. I ask the reference of this memorial to the joint committee on reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also have, sir, a petition which comes from the State convention of the colored citizens of the State of Mississippi, assembled at Vicksburg, on the 22d of November, 1865, in which they respectfully set forth their grievances, and call upon Congress to interfere for their protection by providing for them the safeguards promised in the Declaration of Independence, and, in other ways, securing to them the guarantee of a republican form of government. It is accompanied by a series of resolutions adopted by that convention. I ask their reference to the joint committee on reconstruction.

It was so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitteed the bill (S. No. 35) to grant one million acres of public lands for the benefit of public schools in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 93) to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 121) to provide for the enlargement of the Winnebago reservation in the Territory of Nebraska, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the communication of the Indian superintendent and agent for Nebraska, in relation to the Winnebago reservation, accompanying the bill, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLARK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 134) in addition to the several acts to establish and amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 135) to declare certain streams in the State of Iowa not to be navigable streams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 136) to repeal the act authorizing the settlement of claims against the United States by the quartermaster's department for property used or destroyed by the Army and Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

SENATORS FROM COLORADO.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senators-elect from the State of Colorado be admitted to the privilege of seats on the floor of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to investigate and consider what congressional legislation, if any, is necessary to secure the enforcement of the laws and the protection of citizens of the United States in their civil and political rights in the Territory of Utah, and to report by bill or otherwise.

THE Madder ROOT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture consider measures to promote the cultivation of the madder root in the country, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. President, in 1850 the State Department instructed the consular agents to investigate the subject of the cultivation of this article in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. Their investigations were interrupted in consequence of the war. The consumption of this article, growing out of the uses to which it is put, is perhaps $10,000,000 worth annually. It grows somewhere in the latitude of thirty-five or forty degrees. It occupies the attention of nearly two hundred thousand people in France alone. It would occupy the attention of that number of people in this country if we raised it, and the article would be consumed in the country. It is easily cultivated. It is produced in the form of something like the potato; it has a vine something like the potato. It is planted in rows, and the first year the vine comes from the ground. Before the next year has passed, the vines are covered with dirt in order that the frost shall not interfere with the roots. That process is carried on for eighteen months or two years or three years, and the root is then dug up, dried, and prepared for market by kiln-drying and grinding.

I desire to direct the attention of the Committee on Agriculture to this important branch of the nation's industry, that the machinery of the Agricultural Department of the Government may have the matter under consideration in order that we may, as far as we possibly can, have the various products known to the consumption of this country raised here, and in order that we may find remunerative occupations for the people who come from abroad who are acquainted with the cultivation of this root. I consider it a matter of very essential importance that attention should be directed to it at once. Its introduction in France was from a party who had traveled in Italy, and the people were so gratified at the result of that trial that in one of the provinces of France they erected a monument that now stands overlooking the district that gives employment and profitable occupation to hundreds of thousands of people. I should be glad to award a monument or a reward of merit to any individual in this country that will introduce the article to successful cultivation in the United States. I send to the desk a bag of the seed of the article that I would have go to the Committee on Agriculture, that they may see what the article is in the form of seed.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

J. B. RITTENHOUSE.

Mr. NYE. We had under consideration on Monday the bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron, and it was not finished on that day. I do not know whether it requires a motion now to take it up or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. NYE. If so, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 80) for the relief of J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron.

Mr. NYE. On this bill being taken up the other day, I gave a summary of the facts of the case. After a most careful examination by the Committee on Naval Affairs, I was instructed to report a bill for his relief. I find that there are objections to it of different characters. Among the objections was one from the Senator from Massachusetts, who declared that he would not vote for the bill, even though it was right, for fear of the precedent it would establish. I hardly understand the logic of the argument, for it seems to me to place the Senator in the attitude of doing injustice to others and to himself, and also of impeaching the intelligence of this body. I trust that there is sufficient intelligence here to scrutinize carefully and determine between what is just and what is unjust, and to act upon this question as upon all others and do what is exactly just and right.

This is an old servant of the public in the Naval Department. He has grown gray in the service. Having been placed on the most distant, in the most difficult and most dangerous position that the service to which he is attached requires, he has lived in and breathed the malaria of the Isthmus until a broken constitution and a diseased body give evidence to his fidelity in all respects. His record in the Navy Department stands among the first of its faithful officers. He was intrusted with that money at that important point; he used exactly all the means that the Government gave him for the purpose of its safe keeping; and the evidence shows, and this report shows, that he exercised to an extraordinary degree that diligence which was due to the position he held.

The Senator from Indiana, for whose opinions I have the highest regard and respect, asserts that when money is put into the hands of a paymaster and receipted for by him, the money becomes his own. With great diffidence I beg to differ from that conclusion, and I can state many reasons why it is not so. If I had time I could state many facts going to prove that that has not been the opinion of the Government to whom the money belongs. In the city of St Louis a paymaster gambled and lost the Government money. The Government pursued it and took it from the gambler. Why? Because it was the Government's money. An unfaithful servant had diverted it from its proper channel, and the Government pursued it because it was their own. I do not believe that this Government would consent for a moment to the doctrine laid down by the Senator from Indiana, because it would lead to great fraud. What are the bonds of a paymaster? One or two hundred thousand dollars; and how often have paymasters started from here with as many millions as their bonds were for thousands; but yet it did not become the paymaster's money; it is the Government's money until it reaches its destination. The doctrine can never be sustained for a moment that the Government parts with its title to the public money when one of its servants takes it to be disbursed.

Again, sir, there are peculiar laws and peculiar penalties to which the recipients of public money are liable, which would not be the case if the money became their own. I entertain no doubt about the justice of this bill. My advocacy of it rests upon its justice, after full and mature examination, seconded by as careful a set of gentlemen as are to be found in this circle. It rests, too, on a principle quite as important to the person to whom it is applied. It will be a poor encouragement for public officers, especially in the naval service, if an application of this kind is to be rejected on the ground that it may become a dangerous precedent. Sir, if this officer has been faithful in the discharge of his duty, every principle of economy on the part of this Government requires that he and his securities should be released from the payment of the money. If you deal justly with these men, instead of encouraging them in carelessness, it is the highest encouragement to prompt them to a faithful discharge of their duty.

My friend from Indiana suggested that the precedent had already been established that where money is burned upon steamers, and it is a matter of public record, the paymaster has been absolved. If we are to look on the suspicious side of everything, how much more apt would a fraudulent paymaster be to become a particeps criminis in the burning of a steamer after having rifled the chests, so as to bury all the evidences of his complicity? I say that if in that case the Government excuses these officers, and releases them and their securities, a stronger reason exists here.

I repeat, this man used all the means for the protection of the money that the Government furnished him. So careful was he, as the report shows, that he always kept the keys of the safe around his neck. The Senator from Oregon suggested that from the fact that he let a bundle of keys go into another room in the hands of an officer furnished by the Government as a guard, not of his choice—another Government officer whose fidelity he had no right to suspect—because he allowed him to take the key to go into another room, where the boy acknowledges that he took an impression of the key, that was such carelessness as forbids our entertaining the idea of releasing this man from responsibility for the money that was feloniously taken from him. It was a room into which he could not go for the best reason in the world; he is paralyzed. Notwithstanding that misfortune, the Government find him so faithful that they keep him in their employ, even when by the rules of the service he could be mustered out.

I ask that Senators shall do an act of entire justice in this matter, and I press the bill, not for the reason of setting a precedent whereby others may come in with fraudulent claims. I will pledge myself to the Senator from Massachusetts to be as vigilant in ferreting out fraudulent claims as he could desire, so far as I am concerned, but I ask of him and every other Senator, upon the broadest principle of common justice, if a claim is here made that is right, that the Senate shall adopt it. I trust that this bill will pass. That the larceny was committed there can be no doubt, for almost half the money has been recovered by the vigilance of this officer. A thousand dollars reward he offered himself and the Government five thousand; and the whole body of naval officers on that coast come up here to testify to the entire integrity and honesty of this man. In his diseased condition, his suffering both in body and mind, I ask that the Senate shall do this act of justice toward him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. MORGAN. I now move to take up the motion to reconsider the bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If this will elicit debate, I should like to have permission of the Senate to take up my resolution to appoint a committee on ventilation; I suppose that will create no debate, and will occupy no time. I understand that this subject will be debated. I hope the Senator from New York will permit me to submit that motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to remind the Senator from Pennsylvania that in regard to this bill which the Senator from New York desires action upon, the day it passed the Senate, believing that it had passed both Houses, I telegraphed the entire bill to the city of San Francisco, as it is a very important measure to the mercantile community there, and it has been kept thus far pending in the Senate by a motion to reconsider. While I do not wish to interpose an objection to any proposition coming from the Senator from Pennsylvania, he will see the importance to us of disposing of this question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will await my chance afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to reconsider its vote passing the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. Some time having elapsed since this bill was before the Senate, and several Senators being present now who were not present at that time, I will, as briefly as possible, state the object of the bill.

By the laws of the United States the importer of foreign merchandise is permitted to deposit his goods in public store or bonded warehouse, and withdraw them on paying the duties at any time within the period of one year. After the expiration of that period he cannot pay the duty. He, however, has three modes of relief: he can come to Congress and ask for an extension of the time; this requires a special act, and has in some cases been granted; he can export his goods to the country from which they came or to any other foreign country, and thus the Government will lose the duty entirely; or he can export them to Halifax or the West Indies, as has frequently been done, being the nearest and least expensive ports, and then can import them again, place them in public stores where they can remain for a year and be subject, of course, to the laws of the United States. Now, it is proposed that there shall be some additional relief. The first section of this bill permits all persons now having goods in public store in any of the ports of the United States to enter them for consumption on paying the duties at any time previous to the 1st of April next. There are now hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of goods in the situation I have stated. The passage of this bill will enable the importers to enter all those goods for consumption, and the Government will receive the duties upon them, and they will be entered prior to the 1st of April next. It is not proposed in this bill to extend the period for which goods are to be admitted beyond one year, except that by paying an additional sum of ten per cent. they may be entered at any time within two years thereafter. The effect of this ten per cent. clause will be to cause all merchandise to be entered for consumption within a period of twelve months.

It has been suggested, as a more equitable mode, to charge a specific sum, perhaps six per cent. a year, for any additional period beyond the first year, payable monthly; and it will readily be seen that that would bring some money into the Treasury, because it would be availed of to some extent. For example, an importer has goods beyond the period of one year which he wishes to enter; he would pay the percentage, whether it be one half of one per cent., or one per cent., or whether it ran one month, two months, or more. But the effect of imposing an additional duty of ten per cent. will be that all goods will be entered during the year. That will be the effect of this bill if it passes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire if my friend is not mistaken about that. If they do not enter their goods during the first year, will they not have the privilege of exporting them then?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly. This, sir, is all the explanation I shall make at this time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The more I reflect upon the operations of this bill and the system it is intended to regulate, the more I am impressed with its injurious character and its injurious tendencies upon the industry of this country. The Senator from New York, on a former occasion, stated that the bill was right, and gave his reasons for that belief. He said that the Secretary of the Treasury assented to it as being beneficial, and that it was also fair toward American interests and industry; and he cited the laws which provide that American fabrics shall not be taxed until they are sold, or until they are distributed to the consumer. In the few remarks I had the honor to submit to the Senate on a former occasion I asserted that the bill under discussion gave to the importer a credit of three years before the duties were exacted, and that the importer and the Government combined to speculate upon the articles that were entered for consumption; and the facts are so clear, that if Senators will investigate them for a moment, they cannot be otherwise than convinced.

I desire to read a letter I have received from one of the practical and thinking men of the country in respect to the point raised by the Senator from New York, that the manufacturing products of the country stand upon the same fair relation to the Government as the imported article does; in other words, that the internal revenue tax upon the domestic product is not called for any sooner by the Government than is the assessment and collection of its duties on similar imported articles. He writes:

"Taxes are always unequal and will always be so; but the present excise tax is especially so upon our business. We use pig iron, bar iron, steel, copper, brass, bronze, lead, &c. Now, many of these articles come to us in a finished state and pay the full tax of six per cent. In making a paper roller we pay six per cent. tax on two ingredients before we can commence. Then we have to pay $3.00 per ton on the castings. Then we have to pay six per cent. on all labor. Paper rollers are now ordered from England at a price that will not allow us to build them. Woolen machinery is also being ordered from England. Arguments are of little use, but facts are sure in their results. The taxes that are now imposed on machinery will ultimately result in producing less revenue than is now raised, and if continued as they are now will result in stopping many industrial pursuits; the laboring class will not be employed, and consequently our manufacturers will sell less and the Treasury will receive less. Raise the tariff or lessen the internal tax. There is no necessity of paying the national debt to-day, and it is hardly worth while to break down the industrial energies of the country to pay a debt which is not pressing for payment. Suppose we should be a hundred years in paying the debt, where is the harm? A national debt is a curse, and yet at the same time is a blessing. It keeps the Treasury in a more healthy state and prevents speculation.

"On some machinery that we make we pay five taxes, and then pay a tax of six per cent. on the machinery when we sell it."

Five taxes are paid to the Government in cash before the article that this gentleman produces is sold to the consumer—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. There was strictly no unfinished business yesterday, but the Chair is advised that, although the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) to amend the Constitution of the United States was not made a special order for this hour, yet it was generally understood that it should be considered at this hour, and upon that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Indiana will allow us to dispose of this subject. I do not like to encroach upon the time during which he expected to address the Senate; yet I wish to remind him, and to remind the Senate, that this bill is one of importance, and if it can be disposed of in a very short time I should be glad to have it disposed of.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I should like very much to extend the time for the investigation of the present subject before the Senate, but I see that it will lead to debate. The Senator from Rhode Island is in the midst of a speech in opposition to the bill, and I propose, therefore, to avail myself of the kindness and partiality so generously accorded to me last night by the Senate, and proceed to address them, if such be the will of the Senate.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON to the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, I need not assure you that I approach the investigation of the grave subjects now before the Senate with constraint and embarrassment. No graver subjects have ever been submitted for your deliberation. I have not been able to make that thorough preparation which the importance of the subject demands, and which my profound respect for this high body under other circumstances would have prompted. I shall not be able to rise to the height of this great argument, yet I hope I feel and appreciate its dignity and importance. We approach the Constitution of the United States upon a proposed amendment, and I feel the full force of the injunction of the Hebrew prophet, "Take the sandals from off thy feet, for the ground on which thou treadest is holy ground." I hope that on this occasion I shall be enabled to merge the partisan in the patriot. This Chamber is no fit arena for political gladiatorship. The great questions to which we now address ourselves invoke our most calm and careful consideration and deliberation. An Athenian orator was wont to invoke the heathen gods, before he addressed the people of Athens, to enable him to say nothing but what the people of Athens desired to hear. My most humble and fervent prayer upon this occasion is to the Christian's God that I may say nothing which shall be unbecoming in a Senator of the United States to speak to his fellow-Senators and to the people of the United States.

What, then, are the grave considerations to which our attention is invited? I shall speak, in its order, of the present proposed constitutional amendment and of each of the pending modifications and amendments now before the body as a series of measures which form the congressional plan of restoration and reconstruction. But before I approach that subject it will be proper to look at the present condition of the States lately in rebellion. What is their condition? A portion of the people of the country and a portion of the Senate of the United States take the ground that the States lately in rebellion are still States in the Union, existing and subsisting States, and entitled to all their rights and privileges under the Constitution of the United States. To Senators entertaining this opinion, I mean to address no argument. If they are at present existing States, the terms "restoration," "reconstruction," "rehabilitation," and "admission to representation," are idle and unmeaning words. If I understand the position of those who advocate this doctrine, it is this: that no action upon the part of the President and no action upon the part of Congress is necessary to restore these States to their natural and constitutional relation to the United States. How does that position agree with the present historic position of affairs in the country? For four years these rebel States have sought to overthrow and subvert the Government of the United States. They have been unable to accomplish that object. The Government of the United States has triumphed over them in the assertion of its unity and nationality and the supremacy of its laws. We have been at war for four years. The war has temporarily ceased; at least, there is no conflict of arms; and the question now is, who have triumphed, the Government of the United States or the rebels in arms? If you establish the proposition that the people of the United States have triumphed, they, exercising the rights of war over a conquered population, have a right to dictate and fix the terms of restoration, and establish the relations which should exist hereafter between these rebel States, so-called, and the Government of the United States.

It seems to me that counsel has been darkened on this subject in the statement of the question. A portion of the people and of the Senate believe that these States are yet in the Union; another portion believe that they are yet out of the Union; and the difficulty of dealing with that question is that both are right and both are wrong. Territorially these States are in the Union; the communities in these rebel States are in the Union; their citizens are citizens of these United States. Our national boundaries are fixed by treaties with Great Britain, Spain, France, and Mexico, and all the territory comprised within these boundaries belongs to the United States; every citizen is a citizen of the United States. But the practical question is, whether these citizens are now, at this time, in such a relation to the Government of the United States as to be entitled to participate in the legislation of the Republic. I take the ground that although, territorially, they are in the Union, although the Government by rebellion has lost no single power that it ever had to enforce the laws, to compel obedience, to appoint postmasters, judges, and marshals, to collect the revenue, and to carry on all the machinery of the General Government, these rebel States have abdicated and forfeited every right; they are no longer to be recognized as a governing power under the Constitution of the United States.

But we are told that the action of the executive department has from the beginning recognized them as States, and that Congress has by various acts recognized their existence as States. I shall now proceed to show how President Lincoln and President Johnson have regarded these rebel States. But before proceeding to that question, let me say a word on another point. We are asked now to recognize as existing State governments the present organizations in the rebel States. If we can recognize any State organizations there at all, it must be under one of three constitutions. For instance, the constitution of the State of North Carolina prior to 1861, the beginning of the rebellion, required the election of a Governor, the election of State officers, and fixed the qualification of voters. The people of North Carolina in their sovereign capacity met and overthrew, annihilated and subverted, the constitution existing prior to 1861, and ordained another constitution for the State of North Carolina. Then we cannot recognize the constitution existing prior to 1861. Can we recognize the constitution formed by the rebel authorities in 1861? Clearly not. They repudiated the authority of the United States, and formed their institutions in accordance with the constitution of the rebel confederacy; and that act was null and void. We cannot, therefore, recognize the State of North Carolina as existing under the constitution prior to 1861, or under the rebel constitution that subverted it. Then the simple question comes back, can we recognize the present constitution of North Carolina as republican in form and as a voluntary emanation from the people of North Carolina, who alone have a right to form their constitution? If the present State organization, under their existing constitution, cannot be recognized, then clearly no constitution exists in the State of North Carolina making that people a State under the Government of the United States.

What steps have heretofore been taken by the United States for the purpose of restoring these States to their constitutional relations to the General Government? Mr. Lincoln, in 1863, issued his proclamation for the organization of the States of Louisiana and Arkansas, stating that where loyal citizens to the number of one tenth of the loyal voters of the States, who had taken the amnesty oath prescribed by him, should get together and form a State government, so far as the Executive was concerned he should recognize such organizations as the States of Louisiana and Arkansas. You will recollect that under that proclamation of the President State constitutions were formed and State organizations perfected in Louisiana and Arkansas. You will recollect the further fact that when their members applied for admission here the Congress of the United States refused such admission, refused to indorse that policy of the President of the United States seeking a restoration of these States to the Union. So the question was left when the present Chief Magistrate of the United States became President. He, by his proclamation, issued first, I believe, in the case of North Carolina, directed that provisional governments should be instituted in these rebel States. In order to determine the validity of that organization in North Carolina we must look necessarily at the authority of the President for its inauguration. The President, in his proclamation, bases his authority to issue that proclamation upon two clauses of the Constitution of the United States. The first clause is that which declares that the President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He, under that provision, doubtless, in a time of war, had a right to appoint a governor for each of the different departments in the rebel States; he had a right to appoint a military officer there to command; or, if he chose, I doubt not he had the authority to appoint a provisional governor; but it was all under the military power; all under the provision of the Constitution making him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. How long does that military power exist? Clearly, during the existence of the war. With the termination of the war the power ceases.

Upon the subject of the President's plan of restoration I have only this to say: that upon the death of Mr. Lincoln, and the suppression of the rebellion, he found these rebel States without the benefit of civil law, in a state of anarchy and confusion. The confederacy having been overthrown and no constitutional authority having taken its place, it was temporarily his duty to preserve the peace and protect the Union men in those States; and I have no fault to find with the manner in which he has sought to execute this high duty. But the very fact that he has appointed a provisional governor for one or all of the rebel States is sufficient for my argument. It shows that the President himself regarded the civil authority in those States as having been utterly overthrown, abdicated, and annihilated; and although I regret to differ with my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] and to obliterate or dim the light of one single star that so gloriously blazes upon our meteor flag of beauty and of glory, yet I have to remind him that when this proclamation was issued, the President did not regard these rebel States as in the Union under the Constitution. If these rebel States constituted stars on your flag, they were as the lost Pleiades gone darkling through space, unobservable to any human eye. They could not be detected by the mightiest telescopic power that the judiciary of the country has ever been able to bring to bear upon them. They were not only out of the Union, but they were substantially and to all intents and purposes out of existence; and so the President must have regarded them in his proclamation.

Suppose they were present, subsisting, existing States under the Constitution, what rights had they? They had a right, first, to form their own constitution without outward pressure; they had a right to elect their Governor. The first act of the President was to appoint them a governor. The constitution existing in North Carolina prior to 1861, fixed the qualification of voters; the constitution under the rebel authority in North Carolina fixed the qualifications of voters. The President then exercised the power, as I have no doubt he had the right under the war power, to appoint for them a provisional governor, in which they were never consulted, for whom they never voted; and he fixed also the qualification of their voters. Was that a power derived by the President from the war power? Clearly not. The war power deals with a conflict of arms, the march of armies, the supremacy of the nationality as represented by the Army and Navy of the United States. It has no reference to the inauguration of a civil government, or to the administration of local, municipal, or civil laws.

But the President in his proclamation draws authority from another provision of the Constitution of the United States, and what is that? The provision that it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to see that the laws are faithfully executed. What laws? Evidently the laws of the United States, the laws of Congress, the treaty stipulations of the Government, so far as they are to be carried out by congressional legislation. These are the laws that the President is bound to enforce under the Constitution, and no other laws. He has no right to interfere with the local administration of justice in the several States. He has no authority to interfere with the rights of descent and distribution of estates, of ordinary contracts, of the punishment of crimes under the State laws. He is simply bound to see that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed. What law of the United States, or what constitutional provision, made it the duty of the President to appoint provisional governors? Clearly he had the power only as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and under that authority he has appointed provisional governors. Under that power he has inaugurated State governments. Under that power alone these State governments have an existence. I contend that the power of the President of the United States over this subject ceased the moment the war ceased, and certainly ceased the moment that the Congress of the United States convened. Who has the power under the Constitution of the United States to determine in reference to the status and condition of these States? But first it is perhaps necessary to determine what under the Constitution is a State. A State, in public law, is thus defined by Chancellor Kent:

"A State, in the meaning of public law, is a complete or self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights."

This is the description of a State under the public law and as recognized by the laws of nations, and is applicable to the United States as a State, and is not applicable to any single State under the Constitution of the United States. They have not the rights of sovereignty; they may not declare war; they may not negotiate peace; they may not enter into foreign alliances; they may not do a thousand things that sovereign and independent States may do. Then the term "State" in public law characterizes the position simply of the Government of the United States. That is the government of one State as recognized by the laws of nations. The States under your Constitution are essentially and entirely different things. Their whole power is derived from the Constitution, and must be exercised under the Constitution, and the moment they repudiate their allegiance to the Government and trample upon the requirements of the Constitution, that very moment they cease to be States under the Constitution, and never having been States by virtue of public law they have no entity and no existence. It seems to me, then, that the mere definition of a State under public law and a State under the laws of the United States is sufficient to answer this whole argument. But lest I may be suspected of unfairness I will read further:

"A State, in the meaning of public law, is a complete or self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights. It has affairs and interests; it deliberates and becomes a moral person, having understanding and will, and is susceptible of obligations and laws."

Such is the definition of a State as defined by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. Then I contend that these are not States; and yet, with an impudence without parallel in the history of the world, and with an insolence unknown before, these pretended States come here and claim to be represented in the Congress of the United States; and their claims are echoed by their sympathizers here and elsewhere. For four years they have sought to overturn the Government; they have brought upon the country this terrible war, involving an expense of $3,000,000,000, and involving the loss of more than half a million of your brave, martyred soldiers, who now sleep the sleep of death, victims of this terrible rebellion; and at the end of four years they come here, without penitence, without contrition, without works meet for repentance, and demand under the Constitution the right to representation! These six million rebels in the South claim the right not only to represent themselves, but to represent four million loyal men whom they have disfranchised, in the councils of the nation! And the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, in the close of his speech said—I quote his words:

"Mr. President, inasmuch as the people of the South had no cause for the commencement of the rebellion, let us be careful not to furnish them with one for the justification of similar attempts in the future by forcing upon them taxation without representation, placing them where they can avail themselves of the precedent sanctified by the struggle of our revolutionary fathers. Though they have been confessedly in the wrong and have committed a great crime, let us not violate our own sense of justice by heaping upon them the very outrages which justified the colonies in resistance to a similar exercise of power on the part of Great Britain."

Here, then, is the close of the argument of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. Hitherto, he admits, they have had no cause for rebellion; but the argument is, that if we refuse now to admit them upon equal terms as sovereign States, they will have the same right to rebel against our authority that the thirteen colonies had to rebel against the tyranny of Great Britain. The proposition is monstrous. What is it? Have we arrived at a point in the history of this country when these people have a right to demand recognition as sovereign States, a right to participate in the Government of the country? Less than twelve months ago mighty armies in hostile array were drawn up before Richmond and in different portions of the confederacy to contest the supremacy of the national authority. The green grass has not yet had time to grow upon the graves of your illustrious and martyred dead; the wail of the widow is yet heard in the land; the tear of the orphan yet falls; less than twelve months since the hired emissary of the rebellion struck down the President in the capital of the nation, and we are told at this time if we refuse representation to these people we give them cause for rebellion; and they are compared to our fathers, who resisted British oppression; and that we should "conciliate," and yet further, that we should "compromise." What has ever been accomplished by conciliation and by compromise? I shall refer to that in a subsequent portion of my remarks. We are yet called upon to conciliate and to compromise! Let it be known now and forever, let it be recorded in history so that the waters of another deluge can never efface it, that this triumph of the nation was a triumph of arms, a triumph of force; that we owe nothing to the magnanimity of the rebels arrayed against the Government. Not one single step have we ever taken for the suppression of this rebellion looking to conciliation which has ever for one moment weakened them or strengthened us. The withdrawal of the proclamations of Fremont and Hunter giving freedom to the slaves of rebels, the delay of President Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation, these acts were attributed to our fears and weakness, not to our strength and magnanimity.

But, Mr. President, various plans of reconstruction are now proposed. I have referred to the plan of the President of the United States. It is said he left the qualification of electors and the right of suffrage to the States because it properly belonged to the States. I grant you that under my construction of the Constitution, it belongs to the States having a right to exercise it, not having forfeited their rights by rebellion, but I deny that these rebel States are in any such condition. What are the constitutional provisions upon the subject of suffrage? First—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators."

The President in his proclamation takes it for granted that it is right and proper to leave this whole question to the determination of the States, and I agree with him so far as the loyal States, who have never forfeited their rights by rebellion, are concerned; but I contend there are no States in these rebellious districts having a right to exercise any such authority. Then there is another provision of the Constitution that the electors in each State to vote for members of Congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Then there is still another grand guarantee in the Constitution, that the Government of the United States shall guaranty to each State in this Union a republican form of government. Now, I suppose that in the formation of that Constitution, its framers and authors intended that, in the first place, these States should have a right to regulate the right of suffrage, but that right was to be limited and modified by the Congress of the United States whenever that limitation and modification was necessary to insure a republican form of government. That I suppose is the truth.

But, Mr. President, letting the past effort of the President of the United States to reorganize these rebel States go by without making war upon it, I have simply this to say: if the President of the United States had a right to regulate suffrage at all, he had a right to specify every condition under which suffrage should be exercised. In his proclamation, he has disfranchised fourteen classes of persons, all numerous, who were to have no right to vote, and who were voters under the constitution of North Carolina, and this exclusion was clearly right under the circumstances; and if the President had a right to say that a rebel under certain circumstances should not vote, he certainly had a right to say that a loyal man under all circumstances should vote. I make no war, as I before remarked, upon the President's plan of reconstruction if I understand what that plan is. If by the President's plan of reorganization you simply mean that we approve what the President under the necessities of the case has done with a view to the reorganization of the rebel States, I have only this to say: that I find fault with nothing in the proclamations providing for a provisional government in North Carolina, and the other States lately in rebellion, except the right granted in those proclamations for rebels to vote and the disfranchisement of loyal people. As far as possible, for purposes of convenience, I would recognize the present State organizations, I would recognize the present State boundaries. But if the President's plan means that we shall now, here and to-day, open wide the doors for the admission to these rebel representatives into Congress, then I am against it; I am opposed to it; they cannot be admitted at present with benefit to themselves or safety to the nation, and the resurrection trump shall sound the summons of these rebels to the general judgment before my voice or vote shall summon them to these Halls. [Applause in the galleries.] I have seen no evidence that the President desires the immediate admission of rebel representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) Order! Order!

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. But, Mr. President, it has been said that we are already precluded, that our hands are tied, that Congress has already recognized the existence of these States. Let us, if you please, look for a moment at that position. I have already shown you that Presidents Lincoln and Johnson in their proclamations recognized the fact that these States are dead, dead de jure, dead de facto, and that they have no rights under the Constitution. They have no rights under their present organization—otherwise President Johnson would not have appointed provisional governors for them; otherwise he would not have fixed the qualifications of their voters, and by telegraphic communication, conveniently arranged, he would not have said to them, "Thus far shalt thou go and no further," do this and be States, do that and be out of the Union, until these organizations come to be the creatures of the Administration and not the voluntary act of the free people of the rebel States. It is of the very essence of a republican form of government that it shall have the approval of those to be governed by it.

Now, how has Congress regarded this question? You are told that Congress has recognized the present existence of these States, and how? That we have passed an apportionment bill apportioning certain representation to the southern States; that we have passed a bill for the collection of a direct tax, and have apportioned that among the people of the rebel States under the constitutional ratio and basis. All that we have done. What do these acts mean? They mean simply this: that the census had been taken; the duty of Congress to apportion the representation among the States was upon us; and we legislated upon that subject, not so much with regard to the present condition and relation of these States, as with regard to an anticipated condition to exist in the future, when these States then in revolt against the United States should be entitled to representation, and when we should be in a condition to collect taxes from them.

For instance, whenever the States were entitled to representation, their representation should be under that bill; and whenever we were prepared to collect taxes they should be collected under that bill. Thus far and no further has the action of Congress recognized these people as existing States. Yet we are told that Congress have by their legislation precluded themselves and tied their hands, that they have said in the apportionment act and in the direct taxation act that these were existing States. I have shown you that that legislation had reference, and by possibility could have had reference, to nothing except the future. For instance, when they were entitled to representation it was fixed; when we were prepared to collect taxes, that was the proportion in which it should be collected.

But let me show you other acts of the Congress of the United States proving that the existence of these States was totally and entirely ignored. By the Constitution of the United States a majority of all the representatives in Congress in each House constitutes a quorum. By the deliberation of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, it was determined that a majority of the Senators and Representatives of all the loyal States represented here should constitute a quorum. Now, one of two things is true: either that law was just and proper and constitutional, or all your legislation for the last three years has been unconstitutional. The Constitution fixes one quorum recognizing all the States; you fix another quorum recognizing simply the States that have never gone into the rebellion. Then, so far as that act is concerned, both Houses of Congress are precluded from taking the ground now that these are existing States under the Constitution.

But let me refer you to another instance showing clearly the view which the Congress of the United States took upon this whole subject. Prior to counting the votes for President and Vice President in 1865, both Houses of Congress passed a joint resolution that whatsoever candidate might receive or had received a majority of the electoral votes cast by the loyal States who had never gone into the rebellion, should be declared the legal constitutional President and Vice President of the United States.

There are two express acts of Congress utterly ignoring, for the time being, the existence of these States, and the President of the United States to-day holds his high office under Providence and under that joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, utterly ignoring the present existence of the rebel States. Yet we are told that the annihilation of a State presupposes the annihilation of the Union. Is it so? By virtue of the Constitution itself, when nine States ratified the instrument we became the United States of America. Suppose that four States had never ratified it, then the argument is that though the Government of the United States would have been formed if four States had never ratified the Constitution, yet we are told the moment one State withdraws, that very moment the Constitution is rendered void, the nation is destroyed, the Union cannot exist. It was only necessary to get the concurrence of nine States, leaving four out, and we were a complete State under the laws of nations, having all the powers of a sovereign State even though four States had never entered the Union at all; and yet it is held that the annihilation of one single State would destroy the United States and the Union formed under the Constitution. If it had pleased Almighty God to strike out of existence, and to have caused the waves of the Gulf stream to roll a hundred fathoms deep over South Carolina in 1861, the United States would nevertheless have been a proud, prosperous, and mighty nation, entitled to all the rights of sovereignty under the laws of nations.

But, Mr. President, gentlemen state the argument very plausibly; they say that secession is unconstitutional, that rebellion is illegal, and therefore null and void, and that a null and void act cannot operate to take any State out of the Union. An act may be null, and far from being void. An act may be illegal and unconstitutional, and far from being void. This rebellion was illegal and unconstitutional, but it was fraught with terrible consequences to the people of the South and the people of the North.

But we are asked, did the ordinance of secession carry a single State beyond the pale of the Constitution? I answer you that the simple ordinance of secession did not. They might have resolved, and resolved, and resolved a thousand times, and it would not have operated to carry them out of the Union. It was not the act of secession, but the act of open, violent, and flagrant war made upon the Union. They might have resolved to secede every day in the year, and still have abided by the laws of the United States, and their resolutions would have had no effect. The moment they declared war and became not only domestic traitors but alien enemies and belligerents, that very moment, for the time being, their constitutional relations to the United States were changed, and they can only be restored by the Congress of the United States. The people have too long looked to the President for a plan of restoration and reconstruction. They have looked to him for that which he has no power to grant. Look to Congress. Congress alone, embodying the will of the whole people, in whom resides the sovereignty of the nation, can recall and restore these States to their proper relations to the General Government.

Sir, that is the Constitution. The Constitution says that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government. How can the President carry out that guarantee? He may appoint his marshals with your consent; he may appoint his postmasters with your consent; he may appoint his revenue officers; but suppose in the mean time an aristocracy is organized in any one of these States, or an oligarchy, or a despotism, the President is powerless to enforce this guarantee of the Constitution. It can only be done by legislation—legislation in Congress; and lest I may state that principle too strongly, I desire to refer to the Supreme Court decision in the case of Luther vs. Borden, not for the purpose (I disclaim all such purpose) of endeavoring to shed additional light on this decision after the able and exhaustive argument which we have heard from the Senators from Massachusetts and Maryland, and other Senators, but simply for the purpose of preserving the consistency and continuity of my own argument. This is a decision of the Supreme Court that I refer to with much more pleasure than I shall have if I have occasion to refer to the decision in the Dred Scott case, for then the Supreme Court was the representative of the highest legal learning, ability, and integrity in the nation. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in Luther vs. Borden, in 7 Howard, said:

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.' Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for, as the United States guaranty to each State a republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State, before it can determine whether it is republican or not in form. And when the Senators and Representatives of the States are admitted to the councils of the nation, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding upon every other department of the Government, and cannot be questioned in any judicial tribunal."

Here, then, is the broad ground asserted that Congress has the power to guaranty a republican form of government, and consequently in the event of a conflict, as was the case in Rhode Island, between two separate organizations, each claiming to be the State of Rhode Island, the Supreme Court says Congress has a right to decide, by the admission or the non-admission of members, which is the proper State government in Rhode Island, and that is a political question to be decided by Congress alone. It is not subject to any appeal to the courts of the country or to the President of the United States. It is final and conclusive; Congress alone has this power.

Now, Mr. President, conceding as all lawyers must the existence of the power, the duty necessarily results to exercise the power, and Congress is now called upon to decide whether there are any State organizations which can be recognized; and when Congress shall decide there is no appeal to the Supreme Court; there is no appeal to the President. The voice of the nation has been heard, and it is final, and final forever. And it is well that this high power is reposed in Congress. Otherwise you would make your President a dictator; otherwise the voice of the people might never be heard. Sir, we have not run to meet this issue; we have not forced it upon the country. It is upon us. We stand in the presence to-day of terrible realities. Timid counsels and illusory and speculative theories will no longer prevail. We to-day are to stand true to our own grand mission, or we are to prove recreant to the high trust reposed in us. What is, under Providence, the sublime mission now devolved upon the Congress of the United States? "To break every yoke and let the oppressed go free;" to batter down prison walls and prison bars; to declare the equality of all men before the law, as they are equal before God. This is the grand mission which is now upon us, which we may not avoid or evade.

And, Mr. President, history is continually repeating itself. After three quarters of a century, after we have run the round of long outrage and oppression against the poor African, to-day we have come back to the proud standpoint where our ancestors stood when they gave utterance to that proud, that noble enunciation which shook the despotisms of the world, that "all men are created equal," have inalienable rights. After making the whole circle of history—it has taken us seventy-five years—we have come back to the proud position of the fathers, and we stand upon that principle, and there may stand with safety. Compromises, conciliations, temporary expedients, are evanescent and pass away, but principles are eternal, eternal as truth, eternal as the attributes of God himself. Then let us stand not upon expediency, but upon that grand principle enunciated by the fathers in the Declaration of Independence.

But, sir, I have been led aside from the investigation of the congressional and executive action upon this subject. I have shown you that some acts have been passed by Congress utterly ignoring the present existence of these States, as for instance in the quorum rule and the law regulating the election of President. I have shown you that, while the taxation bill and the apportionment bill seemed to recognize the present existence of the States, they evidently look to the future for execution, and are provided not for a present contingency, but for a possible contingency which may arise in the future. I have shown you that the presidential action on this subject on the one hand has recognized the existence of the States, and upon the other has utterly ignored that existence. The proclamation appointing provisional governors ignores to all intents and purposes the constitutional existence of these States. The proclamation of the Secretary of State recently issued, stating that the constitutional amendment had received the sanction of three fourths of the States, counting the rebel States, seems to recognize the existence of the States.

Then the action both of Congress and of the President on this subject has been contradictory; but for the purpose of my argument, I shall take it for granted that these States in their present anomalous and unanticipated position are not in such a condition as to participate in the government of the country. Then how shall we restore them? You have listened to the presidential plan for restoration. I now propose to show you some plans which have been suggested in Congress, and to direct your attention to the various congressional plans for the restoration of these States.

Some must vote under any plan of restoration, for, the consent of the governed, expressed and known through those whom they select for the purpose, is the foundation of government. It has been said that the right to vote gives the power to rule, and under our system of government that is a truism which needs not to be proven. Ours is a Federal elective Republic; representation is recognized, and the right to select rulers is the right to rule. Hence the importance of the right of suffrage in this country. Now, suppose that the loyal white voters alone in the South are recognized—a plausible theory and not without its supporters—let us see how that plan would work.

I have seen a calculation, which I accept as correct, that nine out of ten of the white voters in the rebel States have participated in the rebellion, excluding those excluded by the President's proclamation. We shall then have only about one hundred and twenty thousand loyal white voters, a number far too small to inaugurate and carry into successful operation a government. Suppose you allow only loyal voters in the rebel States to organize government, and recognize simply the loyal citizens as the State, then how does it stand? You have in the eleven rebel States but one hundred and twenty thousand loyal voters—a basis too small, altogether too small, to answer the guarantee of a republican form of government. Then I take it for granted that no one will now contend that you can organize these eleven States with one hundred and twenty thousand voters; and if you could you would give those one hundred and twenty thousand voters as much power as one million voters in the North. Then the inequality of the measure, aside from its impracticability, would at once discard this as a basis of reconstruction. We cannot rely on the one hundred and twenty thousand loyal votes alone in the midst of a population giving one million two hundred and fifty thousand votes.

Let us take another plan of reconstruction; let all the loyal and disloyal white voters vote; what then? The rebels outvote the loyal voters in the proportion of ten to one. If you let the loyal whites and the rebel white voters reconstruct, the rebels outnumber the loyal in the proportion of ten to one, as before stated; you give over, tied hand and foot and cast into utter darkness, the loyal whites and the loyal blacks into the control of the million rebel voters. Is that to be tolerated for a single moment? That which they failed to accomplish by force of arms they seek to accomplish by the ballot. They belaguered the capital for long months, and their flaunting banner was seen in view of the Capitol. They failed to take it. Now they propose to take it, and you propose to give it to them by means of reconstruction. In the act of triumph have we been defeated, in the hour of victory are we the vanquished?

But we are told these gentlemen surrendered and they are entitled to magnanimous treatment and kind consideration. How did they surrender? When further opposition was perfectly hopeless. You owe nothing to negotiation. You owe nothing to compromise. This peace was achieved at the mouth of the cannon, was written in blood by the point of the bayonet upon a subjugated confederacy; and yet gentlemen talk about rights they have acquired by surrender! It was the triumph of force and nothing else.

Let us look at these other plausible plans of reconstruction, for bear in mind that in any plan devised somebody must vote, otherwise we cannot have a Federal elective republic, otherwise we cannot carry out the guarantees of the Constitution. Somebody must vote, and if the States are to be admitted immediately, somebody must vote now, and who shall that body be?

There is another inequality, a gross inequality, in permitting all the rebels and all the loyal whites to vote. By the freedom of the blacks there is added one and a half million to the representative population of the rebel States. Under the ratio as contained in the present provision of the Constitution three fifths of the black slaves are counted for purposes of taxation and representation; they are chattels for one purpose, things for another; persons for one purpose, property for another. We have come to the point now when we propose to strike down this anomaly in the Constitution of the United States. One and a half million is added to their representative population. Do you propose to have them come in with that increased power? I thought you were to punish traitors and to make treason odious; and how do you propose to punish traitors? By an amnesty wide and sweeping in its operation, and by inviting these rebels into the Halls of Congress with an increase of fourteen members to their representation? Is not this a strange mode of punishing traitors and making treason odious? And yet without the amendment now proposed to the Constitution of the United States, we not only receive them back with all their rights and privileges under the present Constitution unimpaired, but it is proposed voluntarily to give them a representation of fourteen more members in the House of Representatives. What have they done that they appeal thus mightily to our sympathies, that we should not only invite them back, consider the past as utterly gone and obliterated, and ask them to share with us the equal privileges of this free Government, but with the privilege of fourteen additional members of Congress in the House of Representatives? I take it for granted, then, that this plan of reconstruction has no friends and no supporters in the Congress of the United States.

By the freedom of the blacks, as before stated, one million and a half is added to the representative population of the southern States. Before the rebellion six millions in the South had the political power of eight and a half millions in the free States, and if no amendment in the basis of representation as contemplated is made, they will have about the same political power with ten millions in the North, and then they would not represent their slaves as slaves, for every one has now become a freeman and is counted for the purposes of taxation and representation as a man—a free man.

Another plan is to let all the loyal white men vote and all the rebels vote. Let us see how this will operate. This great inequality will still exist in the relative political influence of a voter, North and South, and the latter would have about double the power. Very nearly the same inequality as exists under the President's proclamation would still exist, and the rule would be in the hands of the rebels, they being largely in the majority.

Another plan proposed is to let all the loyal whites and blacks vote, and as many rebels as these votes can control; and why as many rebels as these votes can control? Simply because we do not propose to give this Government, North or South, into the hands of rebel voters. We do not propose any such thing.

There is another plan, now exploded, of colonization, utterly impracticable, and so determined by the enlightened judgment of Congress and the whole people of the United States. I will not disguise the fact that I should prefer a separation of the races if it were practicable. I well know that prejudice exists against the colored race—a prejudice almost ineradicable; but it is wholly impracticable to separate them now. We have no territory for them; we have no means adequate to it, and we cannot force them as freemen to emigrate whether they will or not. Then I throw out of the calculation entirely this whole plan of colonization.

We are brought to the question, upon what safe basis can the States be restored to their constitutional relations to the United States? It cannot be done upon the basis alone of the loyal voters, for they are inconsiderable, and would be utterly overwhelmed by the rebel voters. It cannot be done by giving the rebel voters the power to control the legislation of the country. Now, suppose for one moment that you should determine that a reconstruction should take place based upon the votes of the rebels, what would be the result? What are the great questions now engaging the attention of the people, and which will engross the legislation of the country for the next half century? Questions of taxation and revenue. Do you suppose they will willingly tax themselves to pay the interest upon the immense debt created for their subjugation and overthrow?

There are other questions you will be called upon to decide. You will have to provide a fund for the payment of your invalid pensioners. Think you that they will vote willingly to raise money to pay the pensions of your invalid soldiers when their own invalid pensioners are excluded? Can you hope for any cordial cooperation between the rebels and yourselves upon any of these great subjects of national legislation? Suppose you admit them here in the Senate, they not only vote upon all these high questions, but they counsel in reference to executive appointments; they counsel in reference to the confirmation of treaties; and their power for evil is almighty the moment you admit them with all the privileges of regularly organized and constituted States. I tremble in view of the evil consequences which would result, from the admission of rebel members, to your national debt, to the national credit, the plighted faith of the nation to your bondholders, the plighted faith of the nation to your invalid soldiers, the plighted faith of the nation to your living and dead heroes. For what have they contended during the last four years? The national Union and the integrity of the national territory. And to what lame and impotent conclusion have you arrived when you say now, after the war is over, these men are to be called upon in council with yourselves to determine all this legislation, and to fix the very terms upon which they are to be admitted to participate in the Government of the United States. I, for one, will never sanction any such plan.

But what is the remedy? I have already shown you that the rebels are not fit to vote. Let me show you further that they are not and cannot be fit to legislate. What is there in their antecedents, prior to the beginning of the rebellion, which can lead us to suppose they are at present qualified as voters? They rebelled without cause against a Government which they had only felt in its benefactions. They rebelled without cause against free institutions. They rebelled for the purpose of establishing an aristocracy of caste and color and wealth and blood upon the free institutions of the United States. It was the old war renewed a thousand times of pretended Democrats against democracy. This lay at the foundation of their rebellion. They had no single cause of complaint against the national Government—not one. They simply rebelled for the purpose of establishing an aristocracy founded upon slavery. Is there anything in the inception or prosecution of this war convincing you that they are now fit to participate with us in the government of the country? How was the war commenced? Under the administration of that weak and wicked old man, James Buchanan, treason was hatched in his own Cabinet. They commenced by betraying the country, by scattering your Navy, by taking possession of your arsenals, by stealing your arms, by violating their oaths to support the Constitution, abandoning your service and your flag. This was the commencement of the war; and how, I ask you, has it been prosecuted? At every step in open violation of the laws of civilized warfare; by the murder of prisoners in cold blood; by the starvation of your prisoners in prison pens; and by trampling under foot all the high sanctions of national law and of morals. These measures have characterized the prosecution of the war. What is their present position? How do they stand now? You find in the South various indications of their temper and disposition. You have a law upon your statute-book that no man shall hold office except he shall take a certain test oath that he has not willingly rendered aid and assistance to the enemies of the country. Under these pretended State organizations they have held elections, and in open defiance of that law they have elected rebels to seats in the Congress of the United States, men who boast of their services to the confederacy, whose only claim to support consisted in the fact that they were heroes of the rebellion.

We find the same tone evinced in many of the southern Legislatures. What is their legislation in reference to the freedmen? The slave codes in substance still in force. Some, I grant you, have repealed the ordinances of secession; some have declared them null and void, but not one of them has done justice to the colored freedmen—these orphan children of the Republic: these wards of the nation, whom you are bound to protect, and whose freedom before God and man you are bound to maintain. Not a single one of these rebel State Legislatures has protected the rights of the freedmen. They hiss your national airs, they spit upon your national flag, they celebrate rebel victories, and they glorify rebel heroes; and yet you are asked to admit them into this body. Oh, yes; admit Toombs and Davis and Wigfall and Breckinridge and all the red-handed traitors who left these Halls so defiantly in 1861.

Look even to the State of Kentucky, who has maintained her loyal standing in the Union; what is her present position? You were told recently that the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau should not be extended to Kentucky. Oh! no. Leave loyal Kentucky untouched! She has filled her quota in the Army of the United States. Yes, sir; and more than filled her quota in the rebel army. When the President of the United States issued his first proclamation for troops how was it answered by the Governor of Kentucky? With insult, outrageous insult, and a refusal to furnish a man. The people of Kentucky then placed themselves upon the ground of neutrality—a ground as utterly unconstitutional and revolutionary as was secession itself; and recently, in the proud old Commonwealth of Kentucky, the Legislature has repealed all laws disfranchising rebel voters in that State. To-day they have a right to vote; to-day they have a right to hold office; to-day their slave code rules with a rod of iron the freedmen in that State; and yet we are told that it is improper to apply the provisions of the Freedmen's Bureau bill to the State of Kentucky.

I say these things "more in sorrow than in anger." A native of that proud old Commonwealth, I glory yet in her history; but it is in her history in her palmier days, when the clarion voice of Henry Clay in defense of the rights of mankind and the rights of the nation was heard throughout that old Commonwealth. I listen now in vain for that trumpet-toned voice which was like the bugle-call to battle for the right. If in Kentucky the rebel element is in such a condition, what is it in the States lately in rebellion?

Before I pass from the noble Commonwealth of Kentucky let me say that thousands upon thousands of her sons and citizens have sealed their devotion to the Union with their blood upon the battle-field. No braver and nobler troops have filled the armies of the Union than have gone from Kentucky. I speak not of loyal Kentucky in my censure, but of the rebel element in Kentucky, which I believe now predominates in that State. So much, then, for their present position. Are they in any fit condition to be invited here to participate with us in the government of this country? In my opinion they are not.

I have spoken of the presidential plan of reconstruction and of other plans. I now propose to speak of the congressional plans, and I invite the attention of the Senate and of the people to these plans of reconstruction, for they alone will prevail. You will look in vain to the President to inaugurate a system of reconstruction. He has no power under the Constitution, however patriotic his intentions may be. What, then, are the congressional plans? I shall first speak of the present proposed amendment to the Constitution, which has already passed the popular branch of Congress and is now before us. It is that the basis of representation shall be the actual number of inhabitants, casting out of the account Indians not taxed and all those that shall be excluded in any State on account of race or color.

This amendment, as I have already endeavored to show, will do away with much of the irregularity now existing, and which would exist under a different state of things, the blacks being all free. So far as the amendment goes, I approve of it, and I think I shall vote for it, but with a distinct understanding that it is not all that we are required to do, that it is not the only amendment to the Constitution that Congress is required to make.

Then there is a counter-proposition, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER] which proposes to declare by an act of Congress that no one shall be excluded from the right of suffrage on account of race or color. If Congress had the undoubted and unquestionable authority to pass such a law, it gets at the result more readily than does the constitutional amendment; but it is doubtful to my mind whether Congress has this power. I believe, under the Constitution, the right to determine the qualifications of electors is left with the several States. This law would operate upon all the States. My State having forfeited by treason no one of her constitutional rights, I do not believe that Congress has a right to intervene between her and her people and fix the qualifications of voters. However I might be willing to yield the question that the rebel States having forfeited all their rights, such a law of Congress would be constitutional as applied to them, I cannot recognize the proposition that such a law is constitutional as applied to States in the Union who have forfeited none of their political rights or franchises; and even if I were clear upon the subject I should not be willing to leave the legislation in this shape, for it would open an everlasting controversy in the courts as to its constitutionality, and the matter would always be in doubt. However good in itself, it is, as I think, ineffective in its operation, for the reasons so ably set forth by the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] yesterday. It is a noble declaration, but a simple declaration, a paper bullet that kills no one, and fixes and maintains the rights of no one.

Then the same thing is sought to be achieved by the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENRISON], which is a simple amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that no one shall be excluded from the exercise of the right of suffrage on account of race or color. That begins at the right point. The only objection to it is that its operation cannot be immediate, and in the mean time the rebels may be permitted to vote, and its adoption by the various State Legislatures is exceedingly doubtful. I should not doubt, however, that we might secure its adoption by three fourths of the loyal States who have never seceded, and I believe that whenever that question is presented the Supreme Court of the United States will determine that a ratification by that number of States is a constitutional approval of an amendment so as to make it the supreme law of land. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. President, what do we propose to do? We see that it will not do to give power in the rebel States to the rebels. We see that the Union white men are but an inconsiderable minority, and they cannot be trusted there to organize States. Then if the States are to be organized immediately, the only question is whether the right of suffrage shall be given to rebel white men or loyal black men. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri meets that issue squarely in the face. Whatsoever I desire to do I will not do by indirection. I trust I shall always be brave enough to do whatsoever I think my duty requires, directly and not by indirection.

What is the argument in favor of this proposed amendment to the Constitution? That by limiting the basis of representation you will induce the people of the South to give the right of suffrage to the negro. In the first place, I do not believe it will have that effect; and in the second place, if it would, you are asking me to do by indirection that which I as a brave and honest man prefer to do directly. Still, this amendment having been passed by the House of Representatives, and having received the approval of the distinguished joint committee on reconstruction, and looking on it as a step in the right direction, I shall vote for it, but with the distinct understanding again expressed that other amendments are to follow.

What are some of these other amendments which, in my opinion, should follow prior to any restoration of the rebel States? You should first pass an amendment to the Constitution forbidding for all time to come the assumption of the rebel debts and forbidding the repudiation of the national debt. This should be approved by the Legislatures of the rebel States, and any amendments of the constitutions of the rebel States should be approved by a vote of the people. The guarantees they have given in reference to the rights of loyal men and in reference to the rights of the freedmen are not enough. Though their conventions acknowledge emancipation to-day, they may call conventions the day after you admit them and fix their constitutions differently, or they may so legislate as to oppress the freedman and make his condition of freedom more intolerable than was his condition of slavery.

Then there should be another constitutional amendment passed requiring and empowering in express terms the Congress of the United States to carry out and give effect to every guarantee of the Constitution. Heretofore the guarantee of a republican form of government has been a dead letter. I wish Congress, by a constitutional amendment, to furnish power to carry out every single guarantee of the Constitution, most especially that provision of the Constitution guarantying a republican form of government to every State. The framers of the Constitution, the founders of the Republic, themselves recognized the existence of the separate States with these unrepugnant provisions in their constitutions; but we are required now to begin anew. Old things are done away, and all things have become new when four million people have been suddenly enfranchised in this our day. You are called upon to admit South Carolina, for instance. What questions have you to decide preliminary to that admission? What conditions precedent to admission exist in the Constitution? First, you are to say upon your oaths and upon your consciences that South Carolina presents a republican form of government. Can any man in his sober senses, reared in the light of free institutions, in the middle of the nineteenth century; can any free American citizen, with one single impulse or aspiration of liberty warming his heart, say that that State government is republican in form which disfranchises a majority of its citizens? It is not republican in form according to any American definition of republicanism. The freedmen are citizens of the United States; not citizens under the naturalization law, not citizens by virtue of any treaty, but citizens because they are born natives to the soil. That makes them citizens. To fortify this conclusion, let me read from Mr. Justice Story's Commentaries on the Constitution:

"It has always been well understood among jurists in this country that the citizens of each State constitute the body-politic of each community, called 'the people of the States'; and that the citizens of each State in the Union are ipso facto citizens of the United States."—3 Story, p. 595.

Colored men have been for long years citizens in many of the States, and are ipso facto citizens of any State of the United States into which they may choose to go. Let me read another authority:

"The citizens of each State constituted the citizens of the United States when the Constitution was adopted. The rights which appertain to them as citizens of those respective Commonwealths accompanied them in the formation of the great compound Commonwealth which ensued. They became citizens of the latter without ceasing to be citizens of the former; and he who was subsequently born a citizen of a State became at the moment of his birth a citizen of the United States."—Rawle on the Constitution, p. 88.

Chancellor Kent is still more explicit on the present point, for he says distinctly:

"If a slave born in the United States be manumitted, or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States, and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen." [2 Kent's Commentaries, fourth edition, p. 257, note.

There is the direct declaration of Chancellor Kent that the moment the slaves are manumitted they become citizens of the United States. Before manumission they were held as slaves and treated as chattels; the moment they are manumitted they become citizens to all intents and purposes. I doubt not then, that this construction of the Constitution is true.

But I was proceeding further to speak in reference to the congressional plan of restoration as considered not as antagonistic but as auxiliary to the presidential plan of reconstruction. We have these various propositions for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States. We have a bill lately passed by this body for the enlargement of the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, giving protection to the freedmen whom we are bound to protect. By the most sacred of all obligations—obligations of gratitude, duty, and interest—we are bound to protect them. They are free by the proclamation of your President, by the amendment of your Constitution, by the valor and prowess and blood poured freely upon the battle-field. They are free, and it is ours to maintain their freedom. The bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau is one of the most important measures in the series of congressional acts for the restoration of these States, every provision of it. Then there is another act recently passed by this body to secure the rights of all the citizens of the United States where the grand declaration is made, in affirmation of what was previously the constitutional enactment, that these manumitted slaves become citizens upon their manumission, and they are now to all intents and purposes citizens of the United States. Shall you enfranchise them or shall you hold them as a subject race? You are told, and told with some confidence, that if you permit them to exercise the right of suffrage you will invite a war of races which will end in their extermination. Let us look for a moment to that proposition.

In all of the thirteen colonies (with the single exception of South Carolina, whose treasonable history has marked and marred the annals of the nation from the revolution down) they were citizens; they were voters under the constitutions of the States under the Articles of Confederation; they were voters and citizens in almost every State whose constitution was formed during or immediately subsequent to the era of the Revolution. Did any such results follow? Were there any riots and bloodshed?

Gentlemen tell us that the cases are not analogous, because there were but few and sparse and scattered populations of blacks in the midst of a large population of whites in the northern States where they were permitted to vote, and therefore it is not a fair test. I say they were permitted to vote in North Carolina; they were declared citizens by the supreme court of that State. They were permitted to vote in Tennessee. There was no outbreak or insurrection in either of those States. If you wish to avoid a war of races, how can that be accomplished? By doing right; by fixing your plan of reconstruction upon the indestructible basis of truth and justice. What lesson is taught by history? The grand lesson is taught there that rebellions and insurrections have grown out of real or supposed wrong and oppression. A war of races! And you are told to look to the history of Ireland, and to the history of Hungary. Why is it that revolution and insurrection are always ready to break out in Hungary? Because, forsooth, the iron rule of Austria has stricken down the natural rights of the masses. It is a protest of humanity against tyranny, oppression, that produces rebellion and revolution. So in the bloody history of the Irish insurrections. Suppose the English Parliament had given equal rights to the Irish, had enfranchised the Catholics in Ireland in the reign of Henry VIII, long ere this peace and harmony would have prevailed between England and Ireland; but the very fact that a vast portion of a people are disfranchised sows the seeds of continual and ever-recurring revolution and insurrection. It cannot be otherwise. These insurrections and revolutions, which are but the protest of our common humanity against wrong, are one of the scourges in the hands of Providence to compel men to do justice and to observe the right. It is the law of Providence, written upon every page of history, that God's vengeance follows man's wrong and oppression, and it will always be so. If you wish to avoid a war of races, if you wish to produce harmony and peace among these people, you must enfranchise them all.

But we are told that they are not now fit to be voters. Grant it that they are not fit for voters; and what is the remedy? What are the elements which enter into the character of a man that makes him a fit voter? Intelligence and love of country. Those are the elements. Will you give the intelligent voter of the South who is a traitor the ballot and deny it the patriotic voter simply because he is black and it may be ignorant? There is more safety in an uneducated patriotic ballot than there is in a cultivated felon and scoundrel ready to destroy the Government at every moment by his treason. I grant that the blacks are unfitted at present to exercise the right of suffrage. They have groined for two hundred years, more than two centuries, under oppression. It was a crime for them to learn to read and write; the word of God was sealed to them; they were regarded as mere property and chattels; merchandise was made of their blood and bones, body and soul, and their manhood was utterly ignored. Is it anything strange that they should not be now as well prepared to vote as the white citizens? I grant they are not; and my plan of reconstruction would be this: to pass an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that after a certain length of time, say one, two, three, or five years, all persons, black and white, without any distinction of race or color, who could read the Constitution of the United States, should henceforth be voters, not disfranchising any now entitled to vote. I would give these people the inducement to learn and to cultivate themselves, and before that amendment took effect I would disfranchise the rebel voter just as long; and when the rebel voter was allowed to deposit his ballot, I would arm the freedman with the ballot to meet him. That is what I would do. This implies delay, and delay is now what we want. The danger is of precipitate action. Delay is now what we need. The infant in its tiny fingers plays to-day with a handful of acorns, but two hundred years hence, by the efflux of time, those acorns are the mighty material out of which navies are built, the monarch of the forest, defying the shock of the storm and the whirlwind. Time is a mighty agent in all these affairs, and we should appeal to time. We are not ready yet for a restoration upon rebel votes; we are not ready yet for restoration upon colored votes; but, thank God, we are willing and able to wait. We have the Government, we have the Constitution of the United States, we have the Army and the Navy, the vast moral and material power of the Republic. We can enforce the laws in all the rebel States, and we can keep the peace until such time as they may be restored with safety to them and safety to us.

There is another measure of reconstruction growing directly out of the necessity of the times, and that is the reconstruction of this District. I propose to reconstruct this District by voting for the passage of the House suffrage bill. I should prefer to vote for a qualified suffrage, requiring education. I hope the Senate will take that view of it; but if the Senate should not, and I am called to the rugged issue, I shall go straight forward and carry out the convictions of my own sense of duty, regardless of opposition upon the right or on the left—not exactly regardless, for I should regret to find myself compelled to differ with friends here and elsewhere, for whose good opinion I have such high regard; but in this as in all other questions I prefer to walk at peace with the man within, to satisfy my own conscience. I have arrived at a time of life when I only desire to do right and look not to the consequences. Visions of glory flit less properly before me; I am not as I have been; the airy halls which a young imagination had peopled with gratified ambition are now desolate. I propose to leave such a record as I shall not blush hereafter when I review it, to place myself upon the rock of eternal truth, the rock of the Constitution, the rights of man, and the rights of our common humanity. Upon this rock I stand, firm as upon the earth beneath my feet, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

But, Mr. President, gentlemen ask us when shall these States be restored. Not by my vote, until all these constitutional guarantees are placed utterly beyond all recall; not until the leading traitors in this rebellion shall have been punished, and shall have met the felon's doom. Caius Marcius sent these words to the prætor of Rome: "Tell the prætor that you saw Caius Marcius sitting amid the ruins of Carthage." I see Jefferson Davis sitting amid the ruins of eleven devastated and desolated States; but he was the artificer of this terrible ruin himself, and I have no sympathy or compassion for him. Mercy to him is cruelty to the Republic. Mercy to him is an insult to your living heroes. Mercy to him is a mockery of the dead. Justice requires that he should be punished, and punished sternly; and the rebels should be taught to know now and forever that this is a Government able to govern, capable of government, ready to forgive, but, if needs be, ready to punish. I believe that the cause of justice will not be thoroughly vindicated until some such example is made; not that I have any vengeance or any bitterness in my heart toward these people, but my heart is too full of compassion and sympathy and love for a bleeding Republic to entertain magnanimous feelings toward the traitors and enemies of the country.

But gentlemen ask us when shall this return take place? I answer the question thus: when the constitutional amendments shall all have passed Congress, and been ratified by a competent number of States; when the State legislation shall be conformed to the changed condition of public affairs; when the colored man shall be recognized as a citizen and as a man, and his rights shall be protected; when the Freedmen's Bureau bill shall have passed both Houses, and been put in practical operation; when the bill to preserve the rights of all the citizens shall have received the sanction of the President; when the State constitutions shall have been ratified by the popular vote—then, and not until then, shall I vote for the representation of the rebel States; but to this declaration I will make one or two exceptions.

I believe to-day, if I were called upon to vote upon my oath and upon my conscience, I should vote for the admission of the representatives from Tennessee. I should do it on peculiar reasons, not applicable to the people of the rebel States generally. The loyal people of Tennessee had organized their State government without any interference from abroad; their Legislature had met, their constitutional convention had assembled and had put in operation a new constitution and all the machinery of a State government complete prior to the surrender of Lee, prior to the collapse of the rebellion. They were in my opinion in a constitutional relation to the United States, so far as they could be under the circumstances, before the suppression of the rebellion and before the surrender of Lee. I know something of the history of that patriotic people. Those dwellers of the mountains and sons of the mist, proudly represented by President Andrew Johnson, of eastern Tennessee, stood by the flag, faithful among the faithless. They covered every rocky ravine and mountain pass in Eastern Tennessee with the imperishable glory of Thermopylæ; they in proportion to population furnished a larger number of troops to the Army than any other people. Every single man elected to either branch of Congress from Tennessee can take the oath prescribed by the Congress of the United States. Three or four of them have borne the flag of the country in the very forefront of battle; two of them bear wounds on their bodies, the evidence of their patriotism.

I should vote to admit Tennessee if she stood alone to-day. I am prepared to do it. There is an organization in Arkansas, looking to me very much like a legal organization, recognized by President Lincoln, recognized by President Johnson, having all the attributes of State life and State organization, and I am not sure but that I should vote for it. When I am prepared to admit that the condition of any State is such as to entitle them to representation, I shall vote to admit their members, and lest I may be misunderstood I say now that when any representative is called to that desk in the presence of God and these Senators, if he falters in taking the test oath, he is no Senator by vote of mine.

But, Mr. President, not to detain the Senate longer, I hope that the time will speedily come when with all these guarantees and safeguards thrown around the loyal men and the freedmen of the South we may be permitted to hail them again as brothers, and to permit their participation in the councils of the nation. The storm cloud of war which so long has lowered over and darkened the land, excluding almost every star of hope, is now, thank God, spanned by the bow of peace and of promise, giving assurance that hereafter the rushing red tide of war shall no more deluge the land in blood.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President—
Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Maryland will yield, I will move an executive session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may not go into executive session now. I desire to dispose of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which has come back from the House of Representatives. I wish to bring that matter before the Senate.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hope the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois will not be taken up. I want to say a word for old Kentucky against the imputations that have been cast upon her.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will yield the floor to the honorable Senator from Kentucky if he desires to speak now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Oh, no; he wants to speak on the Freedmen's Bureau bill, I understand, whenever it shall come up.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am in the hands of the Senate and willing to proceed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This Senator is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend will allow me to say a word. I do not wish to interfere at all with the course of proceedings now. If he desires to speak to-morrow, I shall of course make no objection; but I wish to say simply that it is important to act upon this measure at some time, and if we go on making one speech a day on the subject, and then going into executive session or doing something else, it is not very likely that we shall act on the resolution until the Legislatures of the several States have adjourned. Although I do not desire to interfere particularly with the course of things at this moment, I must express the desire that hereafter we may be prepared to go on with the debate and occupy the ordinary time of the Senate until the usual hour of adjournment, by the addresses of such members as choose to express their views on the subject. After to-day I shall, with the leave of the Senate, if not disagreeable, ask that the ordinary time of the daily session, at least, may be taken up in the discussion of this subject when we begin upon it each day.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly shall do nothing now or at any time to delay a decision of the Senate on this amendment. I am perfectly willing to go on now, or wait until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, as he has the floor on this resolution, if he will give me the floor, I will move to take up another subject, and let him go on to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that; but, before giving the Senator the floor, I move that the joint resolution before the Senate be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Several SENATORS. The Senator from Kentucky desires to speak now.

Other SENATORS. No; on another bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Maryland to postpone the joint resolution until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. And to make it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with the amendment of the House of Representatives, with the recommendation that the Senate concur in the House amendment, with certain amendments, which I send to the Chair. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this subject at this time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate will give me their attention, I will endeavor to state what the difference is between the bill as it passed the Senate and the substitute for the bill which is sent to us from the House of Representatives, and what the amendments proposed by the committee are. The House of Representatives have adopted a substitute for the whole bill, but it is the Senate bill verbatim, with a few exceptions, which I will endeavor to point out. The title of the bill has been changed, to begin with. It was called as it passed the Senate "A bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau." The House has amended the title so as to make it read, "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees,' and for other purposes." Of course there is no importance in that.

The first amendment which the House has made, and the most important one, will be found to commence in the eighth line of the first section. The House has inserted words limiting the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau to those sections of country within which the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866. As the bill passed the Senate, it will be remembered that it extended to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States, and the President was authorized to divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts. The House amend that so as to authorize the President to divide the section of country within which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866, containing such refugees and freedmen, into districts. The writ of habeas corpus on the 1st day of February last was suspended in the late rebellious States, including Kentucky, and in none other. The writ of habeas corpus was restored by the President's proclamation in Maryland, in Delaware, and in Missouri, all of which have been slaveholding States.

As the bill passed the Senate, it will be observed it only extended to refugees and freedmen in the United States, wherever they might be, and the President was authorized to divide the region of country containing such refugees and freedmen, and it had no operation except in States where there were refugees and freedmen. The House has limited it so that it will not have operation in Maryland or Delaware or Missouri or any of the northern States.

The next amendment which was made in the House was in the third line of the second section. It read: "That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts." The House amend that by making it read in this form: "That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, and when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau." I do not think the alteration at all material.

The House has also amended another clause in the same section, so as to limit the number of clerks and their pay. The House also attached a proviso to the third section defining who were suffering persons, in these words:

"That no person shall be deemed 'destitute,' 'suffering,' or 'dependent upon the Government for support,' within the meaning of this act, who, being able to find employment, could by proper industry and exertion avoid such destitution, suffering, or dependence."

They also inserted the word "former" before "owner" in the eighth line of the fifth section, which perhaps does not alter the meaning, and they attached a proviso to the fifth section, in these words:

"Provided, That whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall make application for restoration of said lands, the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement and with the written consent of said occupants, to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, not exceeding forty acres for each occupant, or to set apart for them, out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill, forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section."

The House also amended the sixth section, beginning with the word "but" in the seventh line. That is the section which relates to the purchase of lands for refugees and freedmen. The House make it read:

"But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for such purposes. And no payments shall be made for lands purchased under this section, except for asylums and schools, from any moneys not specifically appropriated therefor."

The effect of that amendment is to limit and restrict the operation of the bill. As it passed the Senate the purchases could be made out of any moneys appropriated for the general purposes of the bureau. As amended by the House of Representatives the purchase can only be made after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for the purpose, and no lands can be purchased except from moneys specifically appropriated therefor. It limits the operation of it.

In the seventh section the operation of the bill is limited to those States in which the writ of habeas corpus was suspended. As it passed the Senate it was general. The amendment is in the third line of the seventh section where the House inserted after "rebellion" the words "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866." As it passed the Senate the bill operated generally wherever the judicial authorities had been overborne by the rebellion.

There is also a slight amendment in the seventh section, thirteenth line. That is the section which declares that negroes and mulattoes shall have the same civil rights as white persons, and have the same security of person and estate. The House have inserted these words, "including the constitutional right of bearing arms." I think that does not alter the meaning.

They have also struck out of this section, in line seventeen, the words "except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." I do not think that those words have any material effect whether they are out or in the section.

In section eight the House has limited the operation of the bill by inserting the words "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866." These words are twice inserted in that section, so as to limit the operation of the bill to those States where the writ of habeas corpus was suspended.

In line twenty-five of section eight the House has inserted after the word "this" the words "and the preceding section," so that the jurisdiction conferred by this section and the preceding section on the officers and agents of the bureau are to cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases.

These, I believe, are all the changes of the Senate bill. The Committee on the Judiciary have considered the subject, and recommend to the Senate that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House with only one substantial exception. There are two or three formal ones.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment recommended by the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was in section one, line eight, of the amendment of the House of Representatives, after the word "country" to strike out the words "within which the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866;" so that it will read:

"That the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States, and the President may divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, &c."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to explain the effect of the amendments recommended by the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee recommend a concurrence with the House with this exception. We propose to strike out of the House amendment the limitation which the House has put upon the operation of the bill. The effect of the amendment of the House is to prevent the operation of the bureau in Maryland, Delaware, Missouri, and in some of the other States. That is the only important amendment which the Judiciary Committee recommend. They recommend a verbal amendment in the fifth section which it is unnecessary to explain until we come to it. All the other amendments are verbal. I think there are two or three other verbal amendments. But the only substantial disagreement which the Committee on the Judiciary recommend with the House proposition is the one to strike out this limitation and leave the bill in that respect as it passed the Senate.

I wish to say upon that point that the bill as it passed the Senate can have no operation except in regions of country where there are refugees and freedmen. It is confined to those districts of country, and it could not have operation in most of the loyal States. But it is desirable, as I am informed, and it was so stated by one of the Senators from Maryland, that the operations of this bill should be extended to Maryland. It may be necessary that it should be extended to Missouri, and possibly to Delaware. I trust not; but the authority to extend it there ought to exist if there should be occasion for it. The only objection I have to limiting the operation of the bill to the late slaveholding States is that I think it bad legislation, when we are endeavoring to break down discrimination and distinction, to pass a law which is to operate in one State of the Union and not in another. I would rather that the law should be general, although I am fully aware that there is nothing for the law to operate upon in most of the States of the Union. I do not feel quite willing to vote upon Kentucky, for instance, a law that I am not willing to have applicable to the State of Illinois, if such a state of facts exists as that the law can operate in Illinois. I prefer, therefore, to have the bill in the shape in which it passed the Senate, and such was the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I submit to the Presiding Officer whether the question upon these amendments will be one question or several. We recommend the adoption of the House amendment with certain amendments. Will they be considered separately?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) Separately, the Chair thinks.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I do not mean to attempt to travel over the whole subject of this bill. I rose, in the first instance, because of the imputation the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] chose to cast upon the loyalty of Kentucky. I will say to that Senator that he does not know Kentucky; that she is not in the hands of rebels, and never has been. A truer and more loyal people to the Union of these States never existed, and she has testified it throughout this whole war. That there have been rebels and disloyal persons in the State of Kentucky I do not pretend to deny; but what State in the Union is there that has not contained some men who were false to their Government? The Senator from Indiana, once a Kentuckian, is a Kentuckian no longer. He does not know the people of Kentucky or their sentiments. I stood in Kentucky during this long contest, a part of the time in the very midst of the strife, and almost in the midst of the war, and I know that Kentucky is loyal to the core, and since we changed the government from the existing Governor at the time the difficulties were breaking out, we have always had a loyal Governor and a loyal Legislature, and we have at this day. There are some local differences about men, and different men may have their friends, and they may defeat or postpone an election. They did postpone the election when I was sent here; but there was no disloyalty that caused the postponement. There was no disloyalty that caused the postponement last year. You cannot trust a better people, a more loyal people, or a people who have made more sacrifices for this Union than the people of Kentucky; but, gentlemen, you will pardon me for saying it, you treat them as though they were rebels, and upon false information you are led to believe it. It is an unpleasant thing to be told by gentlemen that we come from a disloyal State, and that they are not willing to listen to us, nor give us a fair hearing in the decision of questions here. But, sir, we were sent here to help the Government to the best of our ability and judgment, and no distrust shall make us fail in our duty.

Let me say to you, Senators, that you made a sad mistake when you raised the committee of fifteen. That was the foundation of postponing the acknowledgment of these southern States. You will have to acknowledge these States and let them in, or you will have to do worse. It is not worth while to speculate as to what will be the consequences. You have provided in this Freedmen's Bureau bill and another bill for governing them for five or twenty years as provinces, to be governed by military men, and military judges are provided, from whose decisions there is no appeal, with no provision for a jury, and the judgment of the officer of the Freedmen's Bureau is to be the sole measure of damages. Our experience in Kentucky is that the Freedmen's Bureau is a system for plundering the people. We know an instance where a man declared that it was too much power to give to any one, but he was living upon the country there and heintended that his books should show a balance. What is to be done with the fines that are imposed and collected by this bureau? This bill does not say. They are to go into the pockets of these officers; they have gone into their pockets in Kentucky; and hence, during this war, we have been plundered by Federal officers who have arrested our people and compelled them to pay large fines to be released, and we have been plundered by the rebels when they invaded our State. We have suffered all this, and our patriotism and our loyalty have endured through all those evils. You have not treated Kentucky as a member of this Union, and this very bill shows the prejudices that exist against her. Kentucky is the only loyal State that is selected by the bill, as it comes from the House, for this system of punishment. The gentleman from Illinois says that he does not like congressional legislation which does not apply to all the States, but here is a proposition passed by Congress, which has no authority to pass anything but general laws, except in the disposition of lands in the Territories, confined expressly, if not in terms, to one section of this Union, which, with the exception of Kentucky, is without a representative here to be heard in behalf of its people.

I tell you, gentlemen, that the passage of this system of bills is a dissolution of this Union, and you cannot help it. You cannot govern them upon this system of government as conquered States. If they are conquered, they offer to come in. You refuse them; you are going to have guarantees. They fold their arms. They have knocked for admission and you have denied them. Their appeal now is to the American people, to the sound sense of the nation, to the honest feelings of a free people, is this right? Is this according to the examples of our revolutionary fathers? Is it what ought to be done? When that appeal is made, from the South and the North, the East and the West, a verdict will come up, either approving your course or condemning it. If it is approved, there can be no Union; it will be impossible for you to carry on this Government under any such system. As the war is now over, I think we should admit these States as a matter of policy. I do not go into the question of the justice of it. States govern by policy; States ought to govern by policy; but instead of that, instead of forgiveness, instead of receiving them with open arms, we heap upon them unmitigated abuse, and in this very bill are providing for their government for a term of years as conquered provinces.

I do not desire to go into a discussion of this measure again. I consider it, so far as Kentucky is concerned, as a warrant to plunder our people in the future as they have been plundered in the past. We have been a patient people because we thought that we were making a sacrifice to the Union. But when the Union is not to be restored, when there is nothing of that feeling to make the people endure, do you suppose they will endure forever? Do you suppose this bill will attach the people in these eleven States more thoroughly to the Union than they felt when they reorganized their State governments, passed laws manumitting their slaves, electing their Legislatures, and doing all that was indicated as necessary to be done? Do you suppose that there will ever come a time under this bill that they will desire to become members of this Union once more? I see in this bill exactly how Kentucky is tolerated here, for as to having part in this legislation, when she is charged openly with being ruled at home by rebels, our counsels can be of no good here; but still we are not to be driven from the Union, and from raising our voice in favor of it, and raising it in favor of conciliation and confidence from one section to the other. Gentlemen do not get these doctrines of hatred and vengeance from the Gospel. These are not the doctrines taught by the Saviour of the world. While you cry for justice to the African, you are not slow to commit wrong and outrage on the white race.

I always regret to feel as I do now, that this bill is doing an injustice to Kentucky, that it is impolitic to the balance of the States, that it is calculated for mischief, and that I and the rest of the representatives from Kentucky are mistrusted here because you have got it into your heads from some source or other that there are rebels in Kentucky.

Sir, there were rebels in all the States. There was in the beginning, and will be again if you drive these people to desperation. The Senator from Massachusetts, if I understood his language aright, threatened us with war or worse if we did not yield to his suggestions, and the Senator from Indiana intimated very strongly the same thing. You have strength enough to carry these measures, if it is the sentiment of the nation: but we are not a people to be alarmed by words or threats. Most of us are willing to impart to these colored people what the nation has granted, and to accord it freely, and to the full extent. There are prejudices among our people that prevent some of them from coming to this now; but we think you are not yet prepared to drop your prejudices in relation to the necessary legislation for the South and what must be done with these people. They belong to the South; they belong to the States where they are; and it is for them to govern this question; and it is better for them and better for you and for us all that that system of government be early commenced, and that the two races get to understand each other. The Utopian hopes that gentlemen entertain in regard to the African population can never be realized, and if they are not realized they will not be so anxious to confer the right of suffrage upon them, nor so ready to denounce everybody that will not agree to it. I know that the passage of this Freedmen's Bureau bill is decreed, and that the degradation of Kentucky, so far as she can be degraded by congressional legislation, is decreed. I am prepared to counsel peace, to counsel fidelity to the Union, to counsel the people to await the day when a better feeling and a better sentiment will prevail throughout the Union that will do Kentucky justice.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators will bear me witness that during this whole debate I have sat rather as a spectator than as a participant. I have desired not to commit myself too hastily upon any of the questions discussed, but to reserve my opinion and to act and vote understandingly without feeling or prejudice or passion. It was after full reflection that I voted for the two bills that have been so harshly characterized by the Senator from Kentucky. I listened with some surprise to the remarks made by him the other day. He evinced a degree of feeling that I thought was entirely uncalled for. I have nothing to say in regard to the present position of Kentucky and Indiana, and the remark made by the Senator from Indiana; and yet it is true that Kentucky at all periods of this war has been full of rebels; that hundreds and thousands of our brave soldiers have been killed by Kentucky rebels. It is also true that Kentucky has furnished brave Union soldiers and brave Union men. But Kentucky has probably furnished more men to the rebel army than any of the adhering States. The Senator will not deny that. Therefore, in legislating for the whole country we naturally do, sometimes, apply rules to Kentucky that we do not apply to other States. He should not complain of this, because he has been from the beginning to the end of this war true and faithful, loyal and obedient to the Government and to the laws. In the early portion of the war he certainly was very active and efficient in aiding our troops and doing all he could to maintain the Government, and I believe has sustained that position from the beginning to the end. But he will remember also that his fellow-citizens of Kentucky gave us more trouble than probably the same number of rebels in any portion of the country. Either because of their spirit, their devotion to their cause, or from the fact that they were far North, occupying a strong military position, the rebels in Kentucky were the most dangerous rebels in the country, and, therefore, in legislating against rebels, we naturally look to the rebels of Kentucky.

The only reason why I rose at this late period of the debate was to remove the impression from the minds of those around me of the character of the two bills that have been before us. I look upon this Freedmen's Bureau bill as simply a temporary protection to the freedmen in the southern States. We are bound by every consideration of honor, by every obligation that can rest upon any people, to protect the freedmen from the rebels of the southern States; ay, sir, and to protect them from the loyal men of the southern States. We know that, on account of the prejudices instilled by the system of slavery pervading all parts of the southern States, the southern people will not do justice to the freedmen in those States. We know that in the course of the war these freedmen have been emancipated; that they have aided us in this conflict; and therefore we are bound by every consideration of honor, of faith, of public morals, to protect and maintain all the essential incidents of freedom to them. I have no doubt that in doing this we shall encounter the prejudices not only of rebels, but of loyal men; but still the obligation and guarantee is none the less binding on us. We must maintain their freedom, and with it all the incidents and all the rights of freedom.

With no other desire but to maintain this guarantee, I have read this bill several times with a sincere desire to ascertain, if I could, if there were any serious objections to it, with a view to their amendment, and to remove the objections made by the Senator from Kentucky and others; but I can see nothing in it but an agency in the hands of the President, completely in his power and under his control, to maintain the freedom of the negro of the southern States. The Senator says he has great confidence in the President. So have I. No single act can be done under this Freedmen's Bureau bill without the sanction of the President. Every officer under it is to be appointed by the President; every agent is to be appointed by the President. The whole bill is a mere machine in the hands of the President to maintain the freedom and the rights of the freedmen.

As to the other bill about which so much complaint was made by the Senator from Kentucky the other day, what was it? The first section of the bill simply declared that a negro emancipated by the constitutional amendment is a citizen of the United States. I believe he was a citizen of the United States before if he was free; but to remove all ambiguity or doubt about it this provision was inserted in that bill, and I think wisely. A portion of the same section, or perhaps the second section of the bill, defines what are the incidents of freedom, and says that these men must be protected in certain rights, and so careful is it in its language that it goes on and defines those rights, the right to sue and be sued, to plead and be impleaded, to acquire and hold property, and other universal incidents of freedom.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky in his remarks the other day said that there was not a single one of these rights but what he believed Kentucky would enforce. If Kentucky enforces those rights, that is the end of the whole controversy so far as she is concerned; but if Kentucky, or any other State, should fail to enforce those rights, then we are bound to do it. But I ask the honorable Senator from Kentucky, with all his knowledge of the feeling and excitement created by this contest, whether he is willing to trust the natural rights of these freedmen to the rebels of Mississippi, Alabama, and other southern States? I ask him whether he is willing to hand over to the tender mercies of the white population of those States, the whole of whom were engaged in this rebellion, the care and custody of these freedmen, who were made free in spite of their resistance, in spite of their war? I think I know the heart of the Senator from Kentucky too well to require an answer. He fears that this bill will affect the feelings of the people of Kentucky; but in legislating here we are bound not only to regard their feelings, but the enmity that pervades whole masses of the community in the southern States, and we are bound to protect these freedmen against the public sentiment and the oppression that will undoubtedly be thrown upon them by the people of the southern States.

Some one sent me a newspaper the other day from Mobile, Alabama, and I could not read that newspaper, said to be a loyal and friendly paper, without feeling convinced that the best of the southern people ought not to be intrusted with the care and custody of the freed population of the southern States. The character of the legislation that is proposed in several of those States shows that the people there are not in a temper or tone of mind to legislate for these freedmen, and we are bound to protect them. The other features of that bill only provide the legal machinery by which these rights shall be secured to them; and the last section, which was most complained of, simply provides that the President of the United States may, if he sees proper, call into play the military and naval forces of the United States to enforce these rights; so that the whole bill is a mere machine in the hands of the Executive. The whole operation of the two bills about which so much complaint has been made is simply to place the powers of this Government in the hands of the President of the United States, to enforce to the freedmen of the southern States what the honorable Senator from Kentucky says Kentucky ought to and will secure to the freedmen in that State. I say then, so far as these two bills are concerned, it is my deliberate judgment that there has been no infringement of the Constitution, no oppression upon any portion of the people. They simply provide a way and manner in which the President of the United States may, in the exercise of his constitutional power, protect the freedmen of the southern States from oppression and wrong by loyal or disloyal people.

I do not intend to go into the discussion of the other question that is now pending before us involved in the constitutional amendment. Upon that question, also, I intend to reserve my opinion, and hear all that can be said about it. It is the gravest and most important question, as I think, that has ever been debated in the American Senate. But one thing I know, and which I can affirm in the outset, that never by my consent shall these rebels gain by this war increased political power, and come back here to wield that political power in some other form against the safety and integrity of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I, like the Senator from Ohio, have taken no part whatever in the discussion upon the two bills so very fiercely denounced by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. I believe I did not say one word in reference to the bills while they were pending; nor have I said anything whatever upon the different propositions now pending for amending the Constitution. I am not going to detain the Senate at this hour, because I know the Senate is not disposed to hear any argument, but I desire simply to express one word of regret at a remark made by the Senator from Kentucky. I am from a border State. I know something of this rebellion. I have had strong sympathies with the people of Kentucky. The condition of the people of that State is much the condition of the people of my own State.

The Senator from Illinois introduced these two bills, had them referred to the Judiciary Committee, and they were reported back to this body, and passed. I voted for them. I believed then and I believe now that that legislation is improper legislation. I voted for them reluctantly, not because this Freedmen's Bureau was carried over my State, for I made no objection on that ground. I would not have voted for it if it had not been carried to my own State; and if this amendment of the House of Representatives is to be adopted I will not vote for the bill. I want the bill to be made general. If it is to be made special, if it is to be applied to Kentucky only, I appreciate the feeling that drove my friend from Kentucky to make the most unfortunate remark that has been made upon the floor of the Senate since 1861. I sincerely hope, for the good of the country, that the distinguished Senator may see fit to take back what he said a few moments ago. Smarting under a remark from my friend from Indiana, I think he has suffered himself to make a remark that he himself must be sorry for. Sir, we have had enough of disunion. I hope that no Senator in the future will rise upon this floor and talk, under any circumstances whatever, of another war of rebellion against the constituted authorities of this country. My God! are we again to pass through the scenes of blood through which we have passed for the last four years? Are we to have this war repeated? No Freedmen's Bureau bill, no bill for the protection of the rights of anybody, shall ever drive me to dream of such a thing.

The objection to this legislation is apparent to my mind and always has been. How is it objectionable? Simply because it is an attempt to get around that which is a decree of Almighty God. Four million people have been made free; that is, the shackles of slavery have been stricken from their limbs, and they stand before us to-day, and we are called upon to say what we will do with them. It is useless to get up a Freedmen's Bureau bill to protect them. You may send your agents into Alabama, Georgia, and Louisiana, but let me tell you, you cannot thus protect the freedmen of those States. Did the southern States ever recapture any runaway slaves in the northern States? No, sir. Why? Because it was an attempt to bear down the religious and moral sentiment of the people, and it was utterly impossible to enforce that law among a people who did not believe that slavery was right in the sight of God or of man. And yet the attempt was vainly made from year to year to recapture fugitive slaves. Will you now go into these southern States and attempt by military officers, one in each county, to protect the rights of the freedmen? While that man is protecting three or four or five freedmen in his immediate vicinity, thousands will be killed in other portions of the country.

You cannot protect them in this way. But suppose I had voted against that proposition; I do not know that I can get what I want. I live in a State that was a slaveholding State until last January a year ago. I have been a slaveholder all my life until the day when the ordinance of emancipation was passed in my State. I advocated it, and have advocated emancipation for the last four years, at least since this war commenced. Do you want to know how to protect the freedmen of the southern States? This bill is useless for that purpose. It is not the intention of the honorable Senators on this floor from northern States who favor this bill to send military men to plunder the good people of Kentucky. It is an attempt to enforce this moral and religious sentiment of the people of the northern States. Sir, these freedmen will be protected. The decree of Almighty God has gone forth, as it went forth in favor of their freedom originally, that they shall be endowed with all the rights that belong to other men. Will you protect them? Give them the ballot, Mr. President, and then they are protected. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order! order! Mr. HENDERSON. You want nothing else in the southern States. Away with all this nonsense! It is said that on one occasion, when a people undertook to leave bondage and the shackles of oppression, those who held them in slavery and in bondage objected to their going; plagues were sent upon those who held them; finally the waters of Egypt were made bloody. In order to get pure water, instead of going to the streams that had been made to run with blood—and the streams of the southern States have for the last four years been made to run with blood—the effort on the part of Pharaoh was to dig wells in order to get pure water, not supposing for an instant that that which came to the wells would be from the rivers and would be bloody also. This is an attempt on the part of my friend from Illinois—and I have said so to him privately, though I have taken no part in the debate—to dig a well in order to get pure water; but he will never get it. It is a vain attempt to protect men that you cannot protect except by the ballot. My excellent, good friend from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] a gentleman of distinguished abilities, a gentleman whose name will go down to posterity, a gentleman who will be known in the annals of fame when my name is entirely forgotten, and the names, perhaps, of many around me to-day—he, too, thinks that he can dig a well, and the committee on reconstruction has dug another well for pure water; but the blood will flow in it, and he will find that after all he has accomplished nothing; he has done that which our fathers never would have done, separated representation and taxation; and in after years, when all this difficulty shall have been healed, when northern men shall have gone and settled in the South and southern men in the North, you by this amendment give in Congress to the northern States political power over these people in order to impose unjust and burdensome taxation on them; at least that will be said. Mr. President, away with this delusion! It is but another effort to do that which you cannot do except in one way.

I know that my Democratic friends will say that this is radicalism. Sir, if I were Robert E. Lee, if I were Jefferson Davis, if I were Forrest, or any other leader of the rebellion in the southern States, I would rather to-day take unadulterated negro suffrage than to take the badge this resolution imposes upon them. I would rather take it than the badge offered by the reconstruction committee. Why? Because it is equal all over the land. Introduce and pass in this body and the House of Representatives, by the requisite majority, a constitutional amendment declaring that all men throughout this broad land shall be entitled to the right of suffrage. Do not let Connecticut vote by every county in the State against negro suffrage, and then come and impose it on South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, or any other State. Do not let New York come and say, "We, with the few free negroes we have, will deny negro suffrage, and yet force it upon South Carolina with a majority of negroes." Fellow-Senators, be just and fear not. Do that which is right in your own consciences and fear not the consequences. Consequences will take care of themselves. Do you intend to impose Federal taxes upon the negroes of the South? If you do, give them representation in Congress and give them representation at home. Do the States intend to impose taxation on the negroes? Of course they will do so. Then give them representation in the State Legislatures. When that is done, peace will reign throughout this land; and from this day until the day that it is done there will be no peace. I do not pretend to say what ought or ought not to be done in each particular State. I know that in the great State of Missouri we have one hundred and fifty thousand free negroes, while there is not a former non-slaveholding State in the Union that has perhaps one half of that number, and I say for my constituents that I will agree to take negro suffrage. Let other Senators from the northern and southern States come up to the same thing, and then we can have peace. Then you may repeal your Freedmen's Bureau bill. Why? The freedman will have the best protection in the world; he will have entire protection, because those canvassers for public favor who go before the people will be bound to go before the negro, and they will find in the negro ten thousand merits that they never found before.

I know perfectly well that that is the only protection. You give it at home, you give it at the fireside, you give it in the township, you give it in the county, you give it everywhere. You may send a legion of Federal office-holders to the southern States, and instead of conciliating the people, instead of protecting the negro, you will damage the negro and irritate the southern people.

Sir, are we doing any good here? Here is the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] a gentleman whom I met in the early days of this rebellion. I stood side by side with him in a convention in the State of Kentucky met for the purpose of putting down the iniquity then started against the authorities of this land, and I know his history during the whole war. He has, however, unfortunately used an expression to-day which, unless he takes an early opportunity to correct it, will influence the minds and hearts of the people of Kentucky, and in view of his immense influence and his standing as a statesman, and as a man of morality and integrity, I cannot tell what the consequences may be. It will inflame in all probability the people of that State, and perhaps produce in other States consequences that ought not to be produced. He may say that the people of Kentucky, if my plan be forced upon them, will feel more like rebelling against the national authority. But is it not just? Is it not applied to Illinois as well as Kentucky? Is it not applied to Missouri, and to every southern and northern State?

I do not say give the negro the suffrage immediately. I say just declare simply that no State shall discriminate against him, and then, if you wish to require as a qualification of a white man that he shall read and write, let it be required of a black man. If you wish to require of the black man that he shall own $250 worth of property, let it be required of the white man. Make it equal; let the State laws be equal and let your own laws be equal, and not apply different and distinctive systems to the various States of this Confederacy.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all I desire on this occasion. It is too late to talk about arguing this proposition. I shall take occasion during the pendency of the resolution to amend the Constitution, to give my views more at length, to show the injustice of the pending amendment, and to show that we cannot have peace otherwise than by admitting that which is righteous in our own consciences; and that will commend us to the God of heaven by its justice to all men.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the zeal of my friend from Missouri seems to have run away with him. Having come from being a slaveholder to the position of advocating universal negro suffrage as the sovereign remedy for everything, he manifests a degree of zeal which I have only seen equaled, I confess, by some of the discoverers of patent medicines who have found a grand specific to cure all diseases! Why, he says this bureau is of no account; give the negro the ballot, and that will stop him from starving; that will feed him; that will educate him! You have got on your hands to-day one hundred thousand feeble, indigent, infirm colored population that would starve and die if relief were not afforded; and the Senator from Missouri tells you, "This is all nonsense; give them the right of suffrage, and that is all they want." This to feed the hungry and clothe the naked! He has voted for these bills; but if you will only just give the right of suffrage, you do not want to take care of any starving man, any orphan child, any destitute and feeble person that cannot take care of himself! It is the most sovereign remedy that I have heard of since the days of Townsend's Sarsaparilla. [Laughter.]

I am sorry that upon this bill, or rather upon the question of agreeing to an amendment which is proposed by the Judiciary Committee and which the Senator from Missouri is in favor of, he should have run off to make this speech, assailing everything that did not come up to his notions in regard to conferring the right of suffrage, which he regards as the cure-all for all troubles and difficulties. Sir, I shall not discuss that suffrage question; but as I am on my feet, I do want to say a word to the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I wish we could understand ourselves better. If I know my own heart, I am for harmony, I am for peace; and God forbid that I should put a degradation on the people of Kentucky. I never thought of such a thing. I would sooner cut off my right hand than do such a thing. What is it that so excites and inflames the mind of the Senator from Kentucky that he talks about the degradation that is to be put upon her, the plunder of her people, the injustice that is to be done her inhabitants? Why, sir, a bill to help the people of Kentucky to take care of the destitute negroes, made free without any property whatever, without the means of support, left to starve and to die unless somebody cares for them; and we propose in the Congress of the United States to help to do it. Is that a degradation? Is that an injustice? Is that the way to rob a people?

The Senator says they will take care of them themselves. I hope and pray to Heaven they will; and if they will, I will guaranty that the President of the United States, under whose control this bureau is, will never send an officer to Kentucky. The Senator from Kentucky says that he will advise and is in favor of giving to the colored population equal civil rights. Do it, and no Federal officer will ever interfere with your regulations. All that is proposed is to secure to these people these very rights which you say they ought to have. Is that doing injustice to Kentucky? All that it is proposed to do is to feed and clothe the destitute and the hungry. Is it placing an indignity upon Kentucky to help to do that if she will not, and not to do it at all if she will? Sir, I have been astounded at the denunciations that have been heaped upon this measure.

The only question before the Senate is whether this bill shall be general in its operations, or whether it shall be confined to the rebellious States with Kentucky added. Upon principle I believe it ought to be general. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate, who have examined the subject, believe the bill ought to be general, and we have recommended to strike out from the substitute sent us by the House of Representatives that provision which confines its operation to the States in which the writ of habeas corpus is suspended. That is the question, and I hope we may come to vote upon it, and dispose of this bill before we adjourn.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he make another reading of Gil Blas, and then he will be a better jester. The questions involved in this measure are not those that can be disposed of by accidental jests. They are grave, and lie at the foundation of things.

We had the war of the Revolution. We then had a war with Great Britain in 1812. In my early recollection, I remember there were such things as sailors' homes—a few in the Republic, three, I think, alone, where persons who had been impaired by the accidents of flood and field might have refuge.

I do not remember that there ever was a single soldiers' home. If it was a thing extant, it did not come within the scope of my observation, or was not in any printed paper that came within my cognition. We had the war with Mexico. These were the three wars precedent to this last. I do not know that we had anything more after that than a soldiers' home, and I believe the only soldiers' home there was, certainly the only one within my cognition, was in and about the District of Columbia. Here is a proposition to organize a system of asylums throughout the vast extent of the South. Asylums for whom? We may assume that they are for stalwart negroes from Africa, or their descendants; and in and about that business is to be employed the Federal Government, with all its power. They are to have houses of refuge and places of home all through this country. They are to be especially protected. I ask when and where were the white men of the Revolution, when and where were the men of 1812, when and where were the men of the war with Mexico, when and where were the white men of our people injured, damaged, suffering in battle or from flood, taken care of with the intense anxiety exhibited here, and when were such laws brought into force before, impinging, as they do, upon the Constitution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from California allow me to say a word?

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The bill under consideration provides for white refugees, and under the very bill to which this is an amendment we have been feeding more white persons than colored persons in some localities, and I presume we are doing it to-day, and this bill is for white refugees as well as colored persons.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I being a white man, say for the white men and white women, that they will take care of themselves except under very extraordinary circumstances. The Senator from Illinois, the chairman of this committee, knows very well that this bill was not made for white women or white men, or white men and women's children. It was made to cover, as they say, a forlorn race—lost by whom? By the inconsiderate action of the Senate and the House of Representatives and the Government of the United States, for with consideration they would have all been properly taken care of and had opportunities to make homes for themselves and not to have needed your asylums of refuge.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me to give him a statement of the figures on that subject?

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly, of course.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have before me the official report, which shows the consolidated number of rations issued in the different districts and States during the months of June, July, August, September, and October, 1865. In June there were issued to refugees three hundred and thirteen thousand six hundred and twenty-seven rations, and thirty-six thousand one hundred and eighty-one to freedmen. In August in Kentucky and Tennessee there were issued to refugees eighty-seven thousand one hundred and eighty rations, and to freedmen eighty-seven thousand one hundred and ninety-five—almost an equality.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is a printed book from which the Senator reads those figures; and if I believed all the printed books I ever saw I should be confused with ten thousand lies. "Confusion worse confounded," as Milton said, would be nothing to it. I can perhaps illustrate how such things are made up. It was supposed when I came to the Senate hall that I would naturally hate a Republican, a Black Republican, as he was then called. I was applied to if I did not think so and so of a certain man. I inquired the cause for the question, and I was told that I was wanted before the committee on the conduct of the war. My opinion about such and such persons—I knew them well—I was free to give there, but I am not subject to questioning here in the Hall. I answered the committee. I did not want to know anything more about it. I felt that it seemed to be assumed that because the person who was challenged was a Republican, I would swear that he was a damned rascal! Excuse the "damn." That is the way these papers and these books and these statistics that are furnished here are made up, and I take this occasion to say that from the way they are made up they are not worth a farthing. I care not to discuss this question, for I have my own exact opinions; and regard it as my duty, having been clothed with the office of a Senator, to express my opinions. This bill in all its qualities, I think, is fraught with mischief, but I will not go into that now. I had occasion to say it once before; I take occasion to repeat it now. It is not mischievous to the South alone; it is not mischievous to any particular part of the country; it is mischievous to all who hope that we may at some future day see this Republic reintegrated. There is no one here in this Hall who has a right proper to be here as a counselor of the nation that does not seek to see us reintegrated and once again a common people. All this kind of legislation tends to disintegration as against integration.

I cannot add to what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky a single word, because he has spoken from his heart and I speak from my head, for I come from the far western coast where the question of negro or non-negro has no interest to my people; and yet as an American citizen, born in this country and thinking that I belong to every part of this Republic, from its extremest east to west and from north to south, I feel that I have a deep and abiding interest in the integrity of the whole Union for myself and those who shall come after me and who may call themselves by my name. I say that all these angry things which promote controversy and avoid exactly, avoid directly, avoid purposely, conciliation, are full of infinite mischief. I would not be here but that I feel it my duty to resist with what little strength I may possess all this disposition on the part of the Northeast, if you please, and of those who inherit northeastern opinions, to compel and conquer love, a thing impossible, and the strangest paradox that could be named in thought. Can we be one unless we agree to be one? Can we be one without conciliation? Napoleon said that when he had conquered victory, Frenchmen were friends of the vanquished, enemies no longer; and that is the true law of all high, civilized races. There seems to be a disposition to trample down and destroy and tread in the dust all those who have been our adversaries. Now, I say after they are down, I want to give them my right hand and lift them up. They shall be my equals and peers again, and those who do not say thus are false to their high office in Senate hall or in council chamber.

Mr. JOHNSON. The immediate question before the Senate is the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, the effect of which, if adopted by the Senate, is to make the bill general instead of local, as it was meant to be by the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the honorable Senator from Illinois to say he desired a vote this evening.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may get a vote to-night and dispose of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but a word to say. I cannot vote for the bill for reasons that I assigned very briefly on a former occasion, because I do not think we have the power to pass it. The object of the bill is a very correct one; these people should be taken care of; and as it is equally applicable to the whites and to the blacks, and the whites in many of the States requiring as much protection as the blacks, I would very willingly vote for the bill if I thought we had the power to pass it; but on the question of power I have no disposition now or perhaps at any time in the present stage of this bill to trouble the Senate. I rise principally for the purpose of saying that the information upon which my colleague acted—I only regret that he is not here; I would not speak on the subject if he would be here before the bill was disposed of—is not to be relied upon. I have upon my table a letter written by two of the Senators from the section of the State to which he referred.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. If the Senator from Maryland will give way, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. I hope we shall dispose of the bill. I feel compelled to call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stockton, and Van Winkle—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Norton, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—11.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I stated when the motion to adjourn was made, I rose merely for the purpose of setting right the State which I in part represent, or that section of the State which was supposed to have been so insubordinate as to render it necessary to apply this law to Maryland. My friend and colleague received information that a great outrage had been perpetrated in a portion of Maryland which showed the necessity of having this bill operate in that State, and it was at his instance in part that the bill as it originally was drafted by the honorable member from Illinois, which as I think was confined to States that had been in rebellion, was extended so as to apply to all the States of the Union, and of course to Maryland. I hold in my hand a letter received this morning from two of the members of the Senate of Maryland now in session at Annapolis, from the two counties in one of which it is supposed the supposed outrage existed, and in both of which it was supposed that combinations existed to interfere with the rights of the freedmen. I read, merely for the purpose of justifying that portion of my constituents, what they say:

"These facts, as we have learned them from unquestionable Union sources, (we use the term 'Union sources' in a party sense,) are substantially as follows: the 'colored man, John Mills,' referred to in Murray's letter."

The Senate will remember that my colleague said that a colored man named John Mills had been ruthlessly murdered by a rebel soldier—

"The colored man, John Mills, and a number of other persons, white and black, were assembled in a drinking shop in Worcester county, near the Virginia line. The negro Mills, and a Virginian, who is reported as having been in the rebel army, got into a drunken broil, and both, armed with clubs, fought. During the mêlée the negro John Mills received a blow on the head from the hand of his antagonist, from the effects of which he subsequently died. The civil authorities of Worcester county, as we have been informed, have used every means in their power to secure the arrest of the guilty party, whose flight to Virginia, beyond their reach, alone prevented its consummation."

And in relation to the ability of the State to protect all within her borders, the Senate will permit me to call their attention for a moment to what was said yesterday by the present Governor of Maryland, a man thoroughly loyal, elected because of his supposed ultra loyalty, in answer to the presentation to him of the proceedings of a convention of Union men in the city of Baltimore:

"He pointed out to the committee that they had failed to support his position regarding negro suffrage. On the contrary, by indorsing Mr. Pilkington, the only Union member of the Assembly who opposed the Governor's message, the convention had seemingly disapproved of the gubernatorial position, and acquiesced in the extreme radical party, who, like Mr. Pilkington, were urging their views upon the people of the State. He also thought that the indorsement of Mr. Creswell's vote in favor of the Freedmen's Bureau bill in Congress was disparaging to a Governor of a loyal State. For himself he did not want the aid of the United States, through this bureau, to guaranty in Maryland the negro all protection of person and property; and if need be was willing to invoke the whole power of the State to this end; but he considered himself, as Governor of Maryland, fully qualified to execute the duties of his office. He wished to be clearly understood that he was not in favor of thrusting negro suffrage upon the State, and could never indorse the course of Mr. Creswell in his attempt to introduce the Federal authority into Maryland, or any other loyal State, for the purpose of protecting the freedmen in their rights of person or property."

I have thought it my duty, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate, and all that portion of the country who may feel an interest in the present condition of the State of Maryland, to what I have just presented to the Senate coming from two loyal men, members of the Senate immediately from the locality where the supposed outrage was committed and the supposed combination was said to exist, and coming from the Governor who has recently been elected by a very decided vote, and elected by a vote confined, under the law of Maryland, to those who have been loyal throughout. I am now, if possible, more satisfied than I was before that there is no more necessity of applying this law to the State of Maryland than there is to the State of Maine or the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this bill came back from the House of Representatives yesterday after the Senate had convened, if I recollect aright; and it was printed and laid on the tables of Senators only this morning after the session opened. I have not had an opportunity to read the substitute bill which was offered and accepted by the House as an amendment. I do not see any extraordinary reason for hurrying this bill so rapidly through the Senate. I therefore move that this subject be made the special order for half past twelve o'clock tomorrow, to give myself and other gentlemen who choose to examine the bill an opportunity of doing so.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS and others. What is the amendment?

The SECRETARY. In the first section of the amendment of the House of Representatives the committee propose the following amendment:

In line eight strike out the words "within which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866," so as to read:

The President may divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Illinois if that is an amendment from the committee or a proposition of his own.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is the amendment of the committee, considered, I think, when the Senator was present. We considered it for an hour at the last meeting.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the proposition was to limit it to the States in which slavery had been abolished since 1860.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir, that was not the agreement of the committee. It was to strike this out and leave the bill as we passed it in this respect.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I remember I went to the Committee on Naval Affairs before it was concluded. I thought that was decided.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The conclusion to which the committee came was to strike out these words.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the amendment extends the bureau all over the States, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say in behalf of my colleague, that he has paired off with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RIDDLE] and has left the Chamber.

Mr. POLAND. I was desired by my colleague to say that he had arranged to meet Mr. Bancroft at the depot and accompany him to the President's House; and having to be absent for that reason, he has paired off with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. STOCKTON. My colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] desired me to state if his name was called, that he had gone home to New Jersey exceedingly ill, and was necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agreed to pair off with one of the Senators from Vermont, who was called away by business connected with the orders of the Senate, which he was obliged to attend to. He would have voted for the bill, and I against it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My colleague informs me that he has paired off on this bill with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Guthrie, Hendricks, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Stockton—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cragin, Creswell, Foot, Grimes, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Sprague, Wright, and Yates—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The bill, I suppose, is subject to further amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was going through with the amendments of the committee, and will attend to the amendment of the Senator after going through with those amendments.

The next amendment was in section five, line eight, after the word "owner" to insert "his heirs or assigns;" so as to read, "unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant by the former owner, his heirs or assigns, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section five, line fifteen, after the word "occupant" to insert "upon the terms and conditions named in section four of this act;" so as to read, "to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, not exceeding forty acres for each occupant, upon the terms and conditions named in section four of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section five, line seventeen, after the word "the" to insert "same," and strike out after "conditions" the words "named in said section;" so as to read, "or to set apart for them out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill forty acres each upon the same terms and conditions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line three, after the word "rebellion" to strike out "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line five, after the word "rebellion" to strike out "and in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "rebellion" in line thirty of section eight, to strike out the words "or in which the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was not suspended on the 1st day of February, 1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives as amended.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move an amendment to come in at the end of section eight in the form of a proviso:

*Provided, That whenever the writ of habeas corpus shall be restored to any State not declared in rebellion, then and in that event the officers and machinery of the Freedmen's Bureau shall be withdrawn from said State at the discretion of the President of the United States.*

I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ANTHONY responded to his name.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois a single question—

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has answered to his name. The Senator from Wisconsin can, however, proceed by unanimous consent.

Several SENATORS. Go on with the call.

The call of the roll was concluded, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Saulsbury, and Stockton—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Foot, Grimes, Harris, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Sprague, Wiley, Wright, and Yates—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope not. It is too early to adjourn. There is important business—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 8, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in regard to receipts, &c., from the sales of public lands in California, in answer to resolution of the House of January 30, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad.

THE PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of an appraisal made by the chiefs of the Bureaus of Yards and Docks and of Construction and Repairs in regard to the cost of the Philadelphia navy-yard; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON SPIRITS.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution which I think of great importance to the country at this time. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is unwise to reduce the revenue tax on spirits.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

QUARANTINE AT NEW YORK.

Mr. DARLING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bill introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in regard to hulks for quarantine purposes in New York harbor be considered by the House now.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I object.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. MORRIS. I ask consent of the House to have bill No. 256, to secure equal political rights to all the people of the United States, printed.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I call for the regular order of business.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands, being House bill No. 85, for the disposal of the public lands for homesteads to actual settlers in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida; the pending question being on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to amend by inserting after the word "lands" the words:

And in lieu of the sum of ten dollars, required to be paid by the second section of said act, there shall be paid the sum of five dollars at the time of the issue of each patent.

Mr. JULIAN. I accept that amendment.

The question recurred upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, as modified.

Mr. JULIAN called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the committee, as modified, was then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JULIAN. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. TABER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 24, not voting 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broome, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, DeGreese, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketchum, Kuykendall, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Seafeld, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, Brooks, Chanler, Dawson, Driggs, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, James M. Humphrey, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, and Voorhees—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Barker, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Davis, Denison, Farnsworth, Hart, Hotchkiss, Edwin N. Hubbell, James Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Marvin, McCullough, McRuer, Mercer, Morrill, Niblack, Noell, O'Neill, Phelps, Radford, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Van Arnum, Robert T. Van Horn, Winfield, and Wright—46.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DRIGGS, when his name was called, said, it was my intention to have supported this bill, but for reasons satisfactory to myself I am compelled to vote "no."

At the conclusion of the roll-call, but before the result was announced,

Mr. TRIMBLE said, I was just entering the Hall when the call of the roll was completed. If I had been in my seat in time I should have voted "no."

Mr. BROMWELL. If I had been here in time I would have voted "ay."

Mr. O'NEILL. I would have voted "ay," if I had been in my seat.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was detained from my seat until too late for me to vote upon the passage of this bill. If I had been here I would have voted "no."

Mr. GRIDER. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. RITTER, is detained from his seat to-day on account of indisposition. If he had been here he would have voted against this bill.

The result was announced as above.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN. My colleague on the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. ECKLEY] has been instructed to report a bill from that committee. As he is not now in his seat, I would ask that his right to report that bill be reserved until he shall be present.

No objection was made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STROUSE. My colleague, Mr. DENYSON, has been called home on account of sickness in his family. I therefore ask for him indefinite leave of absence from attendance upon the sessions of this House.

Leave was accordingly granted.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the report of the committee to investigate the condition of the Indian tribes be printed, and that three thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed six thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; two thousand copies for the use of the House, and four thousand for the use of the office of internal revenue.

R. L. B. CLARKE AND ABELARD GUTHRIE.

Mr. DAWES. Some few days since I entered a motion to reconsider the votes by which the House discharged the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of the petition of R. L. B. Clarke, and the bill for the relief of Abelard Guthrie, and referred the same to the Committee of Elections. They are cases which have heretofore been before the Committee of Elections, and were by them reported back and referred by the House to the Committee of Claims; and that committee have reciprocated the action of the Committee of Elections of last Congress by reporting them back and having them referred to the Committee of Elections. I entered the motion to reconsider the votes referring them to the Committee of Elections for the purpose of having an opportunity to state to the House the reasons which the Committee of Elections think should control the reference of these claims to the Committee of Claims.

They have been for a long time in Congress, and have been considered both by the Committee of Elections and the Committee of Claims.

The claim of Mr. Clarke is founded upon the fact that some ten years ago, he was a contestant for a seat in this House, and failed in that contest. It was considered a very fair contest upon his part by the whole Committee of Elections, who reported a resolution for his compensation; but it was so near the end of the session that they could not get the matter before the House during that Congress in which the contest was made. That resolution as then presented provided for the payment of the contestant out of the contingent fund of that House. It is the custom of the Committee of Elections, when they think it proper to compensate a contestant, to report a resolution to pay him out of the contingent fund of the House; but the contingent fund of that House in which Mr. Clarke made his contest has already been expended and the account closed, so that this House has no control over it. Therefore the Committee of Elections, according to the invariable custom, has no right to report a resolution to pay out of the contingent fund of this House compensation to a person who contested the right of a member to his seat in a former House. It would be altogether improper for the Committee of Elections to make such a report, even if the merits of the case justified the payment of compensation, as I do not doubt they do.

If this is a claim which ought to be paid, it should be paid by a bill passing both Houses of Congress, and providing necessarily for payment out of the Treasury of the United States. If this claim should be paid out of the contingent fund of this House the payment would not be approved by the Comptroller at the other end of the avenue, because it is not a matter belonging to the expenses of this House. Any claim that is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States by a bill passing both branches of Congress should properly be examined by the Committee of Claims, not the Committee of Elections. It is true that this claim pertains to an election contest; but that is no reason why the Committee of Claims should desire to transfer it to the Committee of Elections, any more than that the Committee of Claims should report back all claims growing out of military affairs, pensions, or anything of the kind, and have them distributed among other committees. A claim for anything, no matter what, if it requires an act of Congress making an appropriation out of the Treasury, belongs properly, it seems to me, to the Committee of Claims. I hope, therefore, that that committee will not object to reconsidering this matter and reporting upon its merits.

The claim of Mr. Guthrie rests upon a different principle. It certainly has no place before the Committee of Elections; for Mr. Guthrie never claimed to have been elected to Congress. His claim has been examined by the Committee of Elections in former Congresses, and it doubtless has some merit in equity; but it certainly should be considered by the Committee of Claims, and I trust it will be sent to that committee.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the claim of Mr. Guthrie is not one arising under a contest.

Mr. DAWES. It is not. The circumstances, as I understand them, are these: some ten years ago, before Kansas and Nebraska were organized as Territories. Mr. Guthrie came here as the agent of the residents of that region of country to induce Congress to erect territorial governments; and he exerted, I have no doubt, a good influence in bringing about that result. He thinks that in acting as an agent of that character, he was a quasi Delegate, and as such has some claim upon Congress for compensation for the time and money he expended. He never, so far as I know, claimed an election in any shape.

Mr. SLOAN. Then it is substantially a claim to pay him for lobbying.

Mr. DAWES. Well, I suppose that is the fact. I do not express any opinion upon the claim; but it is such a claim as ought to be considered by the very able, intelligent, and firm Committee of Claims which I am glad to know we have.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, as I reported back these claims to the House, it is proper I should say a word.

The Committee of Claims felt embarrassed in the consideration of these two cases to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers, for the reason that they involved a precedent in reference to the payment of claims presented by contestants, by members, and by persons claiming to be Delegates from organized and unorganized Territories. As we understood the practice of the House, whenever a gentleman contests the seat of a sitting member, and fails to succeed in his contest, it is for the Committee of Elections to determine whether he has made such a prima facie case as would entitle him to the usual per diem and mileage.

When they do so report it is usual for the House to concur in that recommendation, as they do in their report on the merits of the case itself. It becomes, therefore, we think, a delicate question to determine whether the contestants should be compensated or not.

In this case of Mr. Clarke, of Iowa, it seems that the Committee of Elections did, at the time they reported in favor of the sitting member, Mr. Hall, report a resolution allowing Mr. Clarke, the contestant, per diem and mileage up to a certain date. When the report of the committee came to be considered, the Speaker decided, and I think properly, that the resolution relating to the sitting member involved a question of privilege, and it was immediately considered and acted on, and he further decided that the resolution for the compensation of the contestant was not a question of privilege, and therefore it went over and could not be acted upon, and was not reached during that session. At the succeeding session the question was referred to the Committee of Elections, and that committee reported a resolution allowing the contestant the same compensation; I do not recollect the amount. It seems to have been brought Congress after Congress before the Committee of Elections, until at the last session it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

We do not want to get rid of the labor, but we do not consider ourselves the proper committee to determine whether a prima facie case has been made out according to the precedents of the Committee of Elections, whether he should be compensated, and if so how much. It is alone on that ground we desire that the matter shall be referred for consideration to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. The Iowa case has been before both committees. The gentleman overlooks the distinction I make. In this House the Committee of Elections cannot bring in a resolution to pay out of the contingent fund of the House any such claim as that. It puts the Committee of Elections in a position where we must say what claims are to be allowed. That is the duty of the Committee of Claims, and I have great reluctance to take that duty away from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROGERS. By what law and authority has this House, by virtue of a mere resolution, to pay a contestant?

Mr. DAWES. There is an appropriation of money by Congress, called the contingent fund of the House, to be devoted to the payment of the contingent expenses of the House on a mere resolution. The act of Congress appropriating that money is the warrant upon the Treasury, and the Sergeant-at-Arms makes report to the Comptroller of the Treasury of such sums as are liable to be expended for the contingencies of the House. It is in that way contestants are paid out of the contingent fund.

And the Committee of Elections have no more ability to pass upon the merits of this Iowa case than the Committee of Claims, for they are as ignorant of the facts as the latter committee; they know nothing of the merits of the case except by tradition. I know about it, and you know about it, Mr. Speaker; all others, except a few venerable contemporaries, know of it only by tradition. The Committee of Elections are not looking into the past, but they are required to look into the future and see into the rights of members here to seats upon this floor; and we do not desire to be diverted from that duty by any collateral matters to be referred to us.

I do not see why it should be referred to the Committee of Elections any more than it should be referred to the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not going to engage in any argument at large upon this subject.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I raise a point of order, that the question is not debatable after a motion is made to lay on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I decline.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House a few days ago discharged the Committee of Claims from the consideration of the petitions in relation to Mr. Guthrie and Mr. Clarke, and referred the same to the Committee of Elections. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves to reconsider the vote by which they were referred, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] moves to lay that motion on the table; the effect of which, if carried, will be to leave the petitions with the Committee of Elections.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and there were, on a division—ayes 55, noes 47.

Mr. DAWES. I demand tellers on the motion to lay on the table.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. DAWES and Mr. NIBLACK.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the House to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who has had this matter in charge to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] withdraws his point of order the House may allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to speak.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire that the House should understand this matter. Mr. Guthrie was formerly a constituent of mine, a worthy and excellent gentleman. He removed to Nebraska, and afterward came here, not under any special election law, but upon a vote of that Territory, as Delegate. He rendered efficient service in the organization of the Territory, which afterward took place. It has been thought—and I think truly—that he has an equitable claim upon the Government, under all the circumstances, for pay and mileage, at least for mileage. He has been kept, as many another claimant upon the Government, hung up between heaven and earth for a long time. At the last Congress his petition being presented was referred to the Committee of Elections, who reported it back, asked to be discharged for the same reason now stated by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWES,] and asked that it should be referred to the Committee of Claims. This year the gentleman presents himself again, and the House, following the action of the last Congress, refers the matter to the Committee of Claims. Now the Committee of Claims come in and ask to be discharged from the consideration of the case, and that it may go back to the Committee of Elections. Thus between the two committees this claim is kept here without any apparent probability of having a fair and thorough investigation.

Now, all I have to say about it is, that for myself I feel indifferent as to which of these two able committees shall have charge of this case. But I am inclined to believe, with the chairman of the Committee of Elections, that inasmuch as the payment will have to be made out of the common Treasury by bill or joint resolution having the effect of law, it ought, perhaps, to go to the Committee of Claims. It is equally within the power and ability of either committee to give it a thorough investigation, and I am not afraid but that justice will be done to this gentleman. But I beg that this House will no longer keep his case going back and forth between the two committees with no apparent probability of getting justice done by Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] what was the action of the Committee of Claims and of the House in the case of Mr. Clarke.

Mr. DAWES. That is another case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a word in regard to that case of Mr. Clarke. It is the only case in which the contest was made in good faith and failed. It has been postponed from one Congress to another as an isolated case, and nothing has been done with it. I hope it will go to the same committee, and receive a fair consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish merely to state, in relation to the claim of R. L. B. Clarke, that it has been reported upon favorably by four committees, I believe. At the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress a bill for his relief passed both Houses, but it failed to reach the President in time for his signature. It was then reported from the Committee of Claims. The first report in the case was made by the Committee of Elections; and three favorable reports have been made by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DAWES. And that is the question now before the House.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. And now that claim is presented with another hitch on it, that has been here for ten years.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Will my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] state to the House how this claim arose; how this gentleman, Mr. Guthrie, came to be here as a representative from Nebraska before it was organized?

Mr. DAWES. Do not mix the two cases together.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will not go into the merits of this case at all, for I do not think it proper that I should. The question now is, to what committee it shall go, and I am perfectly confident it will have fair treatment and full consideration, let it go to what committee it may.

Mr. DELANO. I desire to say to the House that the Committee of Claims have no disposition to shirk their duties in the recommendation they have made in reference to this matter. We considered that the Committee of Elections would be better prepared to report upon the merits of this subject than the Committee of Claims could be. The circumstances attending the contest, the facts connected with the whole subject, they supposed would be within the reach of that committee, and that they would be more familiar with the principles upon which the failing contestant should receive his pay than could be the Committee of Claims.

It seemed to us that the exhaustion of the contingent fund would make no difference in regard to the propriety of the Committee of Elections considering this subject. I do not know that any committee necessarily holds the key to the Treasury. If the Committee of Elections find that there is a meritorious claim here, they have as much capacity to report a bill for the payment of it as the Committee of Claims have. I think that the subject is eminently one belonging to the Committee of Elections; that they are better prepared to judge whether the claim is surrounded by such circumstances as make it proper that it should be paid. And I think, therefore, they ought to report upon these facts, and, if they find it necessary, report a bill for the payment of the claim. And it is upon that ground that we deem it proper that this subject should be with the Committee of Elections; and I have not heard anything from the honorable gentleman, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES,] to change my mind upon that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that that might be true, if the present Committee of Elections had any knowledge whatever of this matter. That committee, every member of it, is just as much a stranger to that contest as the Committee of Claims. And they have no better access to information than have the Committee of Claims; they stand in relation to that claim just precisely as the Committee of Claims do; and their duties are very different from those required of the Committee of Claims. As I understand it, the duty of the Committee of Claims is to find out the evidence upon which such claims rest.

I will say, in behalf of the Committee of Elections, that they have no desire to shirk any proper duty that may be assigned to them. But the House is aware of the amount of duty that is unfortunately devolved upon them at this session. And it does seem to me that every reason requires the House to send this matter to the Committee of Claims. That committee has had this matter under consideration, and, as was stated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] it has reported favorably upon it three times already; while it has been reported upon but once by the Committee of Elections, and that was far back beyond our recollection, and when the matter was fresh in their hands.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the House will not consider that I have abused its courtesy to me. I was permitted to take the floor to make an explanation of the facts in the case of Mr. Guthrie, how it was that he came here, and how his case came to be referred to the Committee of Claims, without going into an argument as to which committee should take charge of it. Now, I do not like this plan of putting into the belly of a speech an argument upon another subject, when that was not the object for which the speech was to be made. I say this with entire courtesy to gentlemen on both sides.

I repeat, Mr. Guthrie came here, and his claim was referred to the Committee of Elections at the last Congress, and it was decided then that it ought to go to the Committee of Claims. At this Congress the claim was referred to the Committee of Claims, and they refer it back to the Committee of Elections. I say that the House should decide upon that question one way or the other. Under the circumstances, I would prefer the Committee of Claims. But I think the case should be disposed of in some way.

Now, to answer properly the courtesy of the House in giving me the floor, I will call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARDING,] to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then it is not necessary to call the previous question, and therefore I will not do so.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of R. L. B. Clarke and the bill for the relief of Abelard Guthrie, and the same were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to—ayes 61, noes 40.

The question recurred on the motion to discharge; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

The petition and bill therefore remain with the Committee of Claims.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, to finish the small remnant of the Navy appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 122, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the bill by striking out lines two hundred and eleven, two hundred and twelve, and two hundred and thirteen, which are as follows:

Pensacola, Florida:
For muster office, $8,104.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out line two hundred and fourteen, which is as follows:

For new gate to dock basin, $30,000.

That is a large price for a gate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and BOYER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to strike out lines two hundred and sixteen and two hundred and seventeen, which are as follows:

For commandant's quarters, $28,245.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that commandant's quarters are erected in every yard, if no other buildings are erected, he being the chief executive officer, who always resides in the yard. The commandant's quarters at Pensacola were destroyed, or nearly so, and this appropriation is necessary for the purpose of putting them in a condition for occupancy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Whether this amendment shall be adopted depends entirely on whether it is the policy of the Government to rebuild the navy-yard at Pensacola. I hope that policy will never be carried out.

This yard at Pensacola has been a greater expense to the country than any other yard in the country. There never was but one vessel built there, and that was the Pensacola, the greatest failure that ever was; she cracked and had seams in her through which a man could almost crawl, and she was finally brought to Washington and patched up here, and her whole cost was $1,000,000. That has been the result of the Pensacola navy-yard. I do not want that yard rebuilt, nor the navy-yard at Norfolk. That is the reason why I am against all these appropriations. We have other and better navy-yards, where we can build ships better and cheaper than we can at these yards. They have destroyed the yards, and I am against rebuilding them.

Mr. KASSON. I desire only to say that it is not a question of reconstructing the navy-yard at Pensacola. The simple question is whether the property we have there shall be protected, and whether we shall provide quarters for the executive officer of the yard who has charge of that property. It is no proposition to rebuild the navy-yard. That is all I have to say.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to—ayes sixty, noes not counted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out line two hundred and eighteen, reading as follows:

For quarters for officers, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out lines two hundred and nineteen and two hundred and twenty, in these words:

For repairs of all kinds, $109,618.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what is the reason for striking out these appropriations, which have been examined and approved by the Committee on Appropriations, unless it is simply because these yards happen to be located in the southern States. Now, the truth is that no other navy-yard in the United States so much demands appropriations for its maintenance as this navy-yard at Pensacola. I suppose the House must know that we expect hereafter to have a whole, an undivided country, embracing both North and South, and that it may be necessary that we should protect the South from invasion as much as the North. I am opposed to what seems to be the policy of some gentlemen here—to strike out appropriations simply because the works for which they are designed are located in the southern States. At some future time, when we may be engaged in a war with a foreign country, it will be necessary that we should be able to protect localities in the South as well as in the North. It strikes me that it is but a narrow-minded prejudice which prompts members of this House to attempt to prevent legislation which may be necessary to prevent the southern portion of the country from being overrun by foreign enemies. This very unwise policy is not at all justified by the fact that we have just emerged from a rebellion in which the South was the main participant and the main actor.

Although Maximilian may soon cease to occupy his throne in Mexico, we may yet have a contest with England; and it is necessary that we should fortify our whole country, South as well as North, so that we may be prepared to meet the combined hordes of the European Powers, if they should attempt to infringe upon our just rights. Because I desire that we shall be able to protect our country, to repel invasion, to vindicate the rights of the nation against the assaults of any foreign enemy, I am opposed to striking out of this bill appropriations which may be necessary for the defense of the country in a time of peril.

Mr. THAYER. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, to be of the utmost consequence that we should preserve the navy-yard at Pensacola. That is the point from which we must defend the Gulf of Mexico. That is the point from which our ships designed for the defense of the Gulf must issue forth, and to which they must go for repairs and supplies. It seems to me to be a very crazy kind of policy to abandon the only navy-yard on the Gulf that is competent to furnish the necessary means for our defense in that quarter. I hope the gentlemen of this House will reflect before determining to adopt any such policy. I trust that they will sustain the navy-yard at Pensacola as one which is necessary for the defense of the United States in that quarter.

Why, sir, if we are to send our ships from the Gulf of Mexico to northern navy-yards, the nearest navy-yard north of the Gulf is, I believe, at Norfolk, and that navy-yard is now in ruins. Hence, if this navy-yard at Pensacola be not maintained, every ship that may go to the Gulf of Mexico for the protection of our commerce and the general interests of the United States in that quarter, must make this long voyage to a northern navy-yard in order to have any petty repair made. Now, sir, it is a most unwise and foolish economy contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. It is penny wise and pound foolish, and I do entreat gentlemen to consider the effect of their votes on questions of this magnitude on the general interests of the United States before they cast them.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, the committee, as I understand, in reporting in favor of the appropriations for the Pensacola navy-yard have not recommended that they be made solely for necessary repairs, but upon the idea of rebuilding that yard and putting it in as good condition as it was before the rebellion. If the only purpose of an appropriation was to place that yard in a suitable condition to repair our war vessels which may need repair in the Gulf of Mexico, I should not object to make such an appropriation; but the proposition is that there shall be a navy-yard there like the navy-yards at New York, Philadelphia, and Charlestown, and that we are to keep up there a navy-yard not only for repairs, but for the construction of ships. Sir, before this can be accomplished millions of money must be appropriated; and after all this is done, not one war vessel could ever be built there. Now, in an economical point of view, I do not think that my proposition is so absurd as the gentleman from Pennsylvania imagines. Economy in all things, in the present financial condition of the country, is imperatively demanded.

Mr. Chairman, I am looking to an economical administration of the Government. Economy must be exercised or the country will be ruined. Whether we shall be involved in a war with England or France I cannot say, but I assert that we have a sufficient naval force to-day, not only to defend our own territory, but to whip the navies of the world, if they should assail us, without building another vessel. We do not need a navy-yard at Pensacola. Especially is this the case as the building of wooden ships of war has been abandoned. Wooden war ships are now nearly valueless, except for store-ships. There has been a revolution in naval architecture; iron and steel have taken the place of wood. The material now used in the construction of naval vessels comes from the North. It comes largely from the gentleman's own State. It is in the northern States where iron is found in abundance; and there also are to be found the facilities in preparing it for use in the construction of naval vessels. It cannot be done at the navy-yard at Pensacola, and should not if it could; and if you continue that navy-yard you will have to ship from the North nearly all the materials which enter into the construction of a man-of-war. Then why should we not have those ships constructed at the North, where the material is at hand? A first-class war vessel built at Pensacola would cost at least twenty-five per cent. more than if built at New York. It seems to me that this Pensacola navy-yard is to be maintained, if maintained at all, more for the benefit of individuals than for the benefit of the Government.

I assert that this squandering of millions of dollars for dilapidated and out-of-the-way navy-yards is more than shameful. It is, in my opinion, nothing but a robbery of the Treasury, and is imposing enormous burdens of taxation upon the already heavily taxed people, for which any gentleman of this House may expect to be held responsible to his constituents.

I do not vote for appropriations for navy-yards simply because they are or have been navy-yards, and only vote for those which are essential to the maintenance of the Navy.

Mr. THAYER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he think it advisable for the protection of the interests of the United States that we should have no navy-yard in the Gulf of Mexico?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, so far as the construction of ships is concerned.

Mr. THAYER. For any purpose?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, if you mean such navy-yards as we have at Portsmouth, New York, and Philadelphia. I would vote a reasonable appropriation for that navy-yard, so that ordinary repairs to vessels could be made there.

Mr. THAYER. How can repairs be made unless you have the necessary work-shops there?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course you cannot make repairs without the tools. If you mean by repairs the building of a ship over again; then I say better sink the ship and build a new one where the materials can be procured at a cheaper rate, for it would cost more to repair a ship in that sense at Pensacola than to build a new one in the North.

Mr. DARLING. I move to strike out the last line.

Mr. Chairman, I go upon the maxim that in times of peace we should be prepared for war. I hold that to be a safe principle for our Government; and in that view, what has been said by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Thayer,] in regard to the navy-yard at Pensacola, is true, and ought to have weight with the House. While it may be true that no ship may be needed to be constructed at Pensacola, still we should have a yard there for the purpose of making repairs of our ships stationed in the Gulf and in our southern ports. I maintain we ought to have a united country, and for that purpose it is essential we should have navy-yards at different points. It is necessary that certain repairs should be made to our vessels stationed in the Gulf, and it is necessary that machinery and other facilities should be established there so as to preclude the necessity of sending ships to the North for repairs. I trust that the House will be more liberal in regard to these appropriations, and not strike them out because they happen to be for yards in the southern part of the United States of America.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have been willing to vote for appropriations for repairs at all the yards. But I can see no reason why more should be appropriated for this Pensacola navy-yard than for any other; and I think the proposed appropriation for it is far more than for any other save one. We have no need for a navy-yard for the construction or large repair of vessels at Pensacola. It is not a fit place for a yard. There should be a coaling station and repair shop there, but nothing more. Our Navy is not what it was—a fleet of timber ships dependent upon sails. It is an iron Navy, moved by steam and machinery. Naval supremacy among nations is hereafter to be settled on land. That nation which has the amplest supply of forges, furnaces, and rolling-mills, of iron and steel, and the most workshops and skilled workers in iron and steel, will be the master nation on the sea. The question is one merely of machine power and skill in working the metals I have named.

At Pensacola, or in that vicinity, there are neither forges, furnaces, machine shops, nor skilled workmen. Nor is the water at or near that yard fit to float an iron navy not on active service. To illustrate that I will read an article now going the round of the papers, which I clipped from the Philadelphia Inquirer of February 6:

"A discovery has been made at Toulon, where the iron-plated frigate Provence is undergoing repairs, which shows the danger that menaces the entire iron-coated fleet of France. The Provence was fitted out for sea only fifteen months since, and already a great number of her plates are nearly consumed with rust. The director of naval architecture is of opinion that if a composition be not discovered to prevent the action of rust, the iron-plated fleet must be renewed every five years."

In the fact thus disclosed is nature's guarantee of the supremacy of the American navy. More fortunate than England and France, we have fresh-water harbors in which we can float iron vessels. Fresh water is a cure for the diseases inflicted upon them by salt water. And I am opposed to making large appropriations for navy-yards in our warm southern regions, in the waters of which worms eat wooden vessels and the salt water rust consumes iron ones, and around which treason holds its sway as completely now as it did in April, 1861. We should not establish a navy-yard or even an extensive repair shop there in the present unsettled condition of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted, and the gentleman withdraws it. The question now is on striking out lines one hundred and nineteen and one hundred and twenty.

Mr. BANKS. I move to strike out the words "for repairs of all kinds." I want to say a single word in explanation of the vote I have given and shall give on this subject. I do not vote against these appropriations because these yards are in the South at all. I vote against them, in the first place, because expenditures that are necessary and proper at another time have been refused to other yards—to one in which I have felt a special interest, and of which I am in some degree a Representative. I vote against these appropriations in the South for the same reason that the House has adopted in striking out appropriations for the navy-yards at the North.

I vote against them, in the next place, because the communities in which these southern yards are located are in an unsettled condition; and in the event of our having trouble with England or France, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] suggested, it might be uncertain whether the sentiment of these communities would be for us or against us. And I am opposed to expending any money in that case not absolutely necessary until these communities or States are in a settled condition and we can count upon their support in the event of any trouble. As soon as that is accomplished—and I hope to see its accomplishment at the earliest possible moment—I will vote liberal appropriations for the navy-yards in the South as well as in the North. But I do not believe it is right for us to expend large sums of money which indirectly, if not directly, go to the support of the political sentiment of these communities until that degree of peace is established which we have a right to require. If it be absolutely necessary to sustain our national defenses at Pensacola, let an appropriation be recommended for that purpose, and I will vote for it. But if it be absolutely necessary that expenditures shall be made for repairs, I would rather vote additional appropriations for the navy-yards in Philadelphia, New York, and elsewhere, with instructions to see that the repairs are made in the southern yards, than to vote to make appropriations directly for them. It is not, therefore, on account of their location, but on account of the general condition of the country that I think we are justified, not in refusing, but in suspending, for the moment, appropriations of an extraordinary extent.

Mr. BLOW. I oppose the amendment to the amendment, and I rise to make a statement in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations. By reference to the estimates of appropriation it will be found that $452,000 was the estimate sent us by the Navy Department for the Pensacola navy-yard; the committee have reduced that amount to $200,000, and this committee has already cut down that amount to about $150,000; and if this appropriation, which is absolutely necessary to sustain the yard, is stricken out, the whole amount claimed for this yard by the Navy Department will be absolutely reduced to $137,000. Better, a thousand times better, strike down this navy-yard altogether, if you have no confidence in the Department which asks you to sustain it, or the committee which brings these carefully reduced estimates to your attention.

I hope, with all deference to gentlemen upon the other side, that this $109,000 will not be stricken out, and that the Pensacola yard will at least be kept in a situation for the repair of our vessels until we determine on some policy in regard to all of the navy-yards of our country; and I beg gentlemen from the northeastern portion of the country—I mean especially from New York and New England—to examine this bill in connection with their own estimates and notice the very small and partial reduction that has been made. I think we have voted $500,000 simply for repairs at the New York navy-yard. It strikes me that this appropriation of $109,000 is an absolute necessity; and the only point before this committee is whether they will strike out Pensacola altogether, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, or make this appropriation which, under existing circumstances, is an actual necessity.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reduce the appropriation to $20,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to have read an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly; let it be read. The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the paragraph so as to read as follows: For the preservation of the property of the United States at the Pensacola navy-yard, or as much thereof as may be necessary, $20,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I accept that as my amendment; and now I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. THAYER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. I simply want to ask whether my colleague has information that the yard at Pensacola is in such a condition that vessels of the United States coming into Pensacola from the Gulf of Mexico can be repaired?

Mr. STEVENS. I think it is in such a situation that partial repairs can be made, not full repairs.

Mr. THAYER. Can those repairs continue to be made without this appropriation?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know of any reason why they may not. I think, however, that we had better wait to see whether this yard is to be seized by traitors again after we repair it. I must now insist on my motion that the committee rise.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. I will, if the gentleman will renew my motion.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will do so.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of this committee will well consider the action which they propose to take upon this bill, forasmuch as the action which was taken yesterday, if it shall be continued to-day, will materially change the naval policy of this Government and the position of the United States among the other first-class Powers of the world. During the progress of the war this Government has assumed a high position among the nations of the earth as a naval Power; but I desire to state to gentlemen that the war in which we have been engaged on the ocean has been an offensive war against an enemy on our coast or in our own waters, and that the amount of money which we have expended during the last four years has been mainly expended in providing vessels and ordnance suited to repel invasion, and to put ourselves in a condition to carry on a defensive war at home. And the results which we have attained in that direction have been such as any American citizen may be proud of. They are such as have commanded the respect and admiration of mankind everywhere. They are the most gigantic achievements that have ever been made by any nation on the face of the earth in the same length of time. And if our territory were to be invaded to-day, and we were to wage a war at home, we are pretty well provided with iron vessels and with heavy ordnance to defend our territory.

But thus far our Navy is largely one-sided. We are very poorly prepared to go into a general war upon the ocean with any first-class naval Power. The reason is because our attention has not yet been directed to that subject. I desire to make this point here, particularly because my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGER-

SOLL] seems to give the impression to the House that we are fully prepared to measure strength to-day upon the ocean with the Governments of France and Great Britain in a general maritime war. I am not willing to sit here in silence, holding the position I do by the favor and courtesy of this House, and allow that statement to go out by my sanction and upon my responsibility. I desire to say to my associates in this body that we are not prepared for such a state of things. And any man who takes that impression to his heart deceives himself, and misleads this Government in regard to the position in which it will find itself, should we unfortunately be drawn into a foreign war.

Sir, great as are the navies of France and Great Britain to-day, they have navy-yards, a single one of which is greater than are all ours combined, and yet to-day every hammer and every anvil in those foreign yards is ringing out with the strokes of laborers employed in fabricating ships and machinery to defend the flags of France and England upon the ocean in the case of a foreign war.

Are the members of the American Congress prepared to sit here supinely and say that we are willing to take the hazards that may result from the political complications of the world without any preparation whatever? Are they prepared to say that we will not maintain properly and efficiently the limited naval establishments that we now have? Are they prepared to say that where rebels and traitors have come in and destroyed our property we will let the ruins forever stand there as monuments of the power of the rebellion against the only free republic on the face of the earth?

Sir, we have nothing local, nothing sectional in respect to these navy-yards, or in the appropriations that are made for them. For one, I disclaim the imputation that there is anywhere room for a feeling of sectional jealousy in relation to one or the other of these navy-yards. They are the property of our common country; they are your property as well as mine; the property of men of the East, men of the West, men of the middle States; and I hope there will be, if there are not now, some time men in the southern States to whom this will also be common property.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a word.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I promised the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to renew his motion for the committee to rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will do so, when I get through. I now move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] by striking out the last words of it. I do this for the purpose of replying to some extent to the speech which has been made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. RICE,] representing here to some extent the Navy Department, and thus endeavoring to control the action of this committee.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] allow me to finish my remarks?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will, if I can have as much time as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] may have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has five minutes' time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will go on. I say that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the organ of the Navy Department, attempts to influence our action in regard to this appropriation bill. I dissent from the views he has expressed in regard to the wants of the Navy. We have gone through this war with the navy-yards we had provided by appropriations heretofore made. We have had for that purpose a naval marine of seven hundred vessels, nearly six hundred of which have now been discharged, and are out of the service, relieving the existing navy-yards to that extent. And yet at the very heel of the suppression of this rebellion, when I say we want no further naval force, the Committee on Appropriations come in here and ask appropriations to the amount of millions upon millions for new works as well as for carrying on works already commenced. And now, sir, this committee has gone through with this bill item by item; and we have, in many cases with the assent of the Committee on Appropriations, struck out appropriations amounting to between three and four million dollars.

Sir, I protest in the name of the American people against these outrageous and extravagant appropriations of the people's money without a direct and pressing demand by the public interest. Sir, in the cases of the navy-yard at Charlestown, and the navy-yard at New York, what are the reasons which have been brought forward for the construction of these new works? Where are the reasons upon the record, in view of the public interest, that require us to vote away all these vast sums, all of which we must borrow?

The gentleman tries to appeal to the fears of this House. He tells us what France and England may do. Sir, I scorn to be controlled by such considerations. I agree with my colleague that we have to-day a Navy sufficient to meet the combined fleets of the world. I think we should not be called upon now to tax our constituents still further when they are ground down in the dust by the present taxation, when we are almost upon the eve of a financial panic, unless the strongest reasons shall be given for the appropriations. I do not think, sir, that the gentleman will be successful in his endeavor to imbue this House with the fear that France and England may whiten our seas with their men-of-war, and that we will not be able to meet all comers in the future as in the past.

I can understand very well, Mr. Chairman, how agreeable it is to parties interested to have these vast appropriations, how convenient it is for persons connected with those yards to have the disbursement of these monstrous sums of money, while our constituents foot the bills. As a Representative representing a frugal and patriotic people I protest against any further expenditures unless they are justified by the most pressing public necessity.

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that this is no time to rebuild these navy-yards at Norfolk and at Pensacola. The ruins of those navy-yards destroyed by the rebels are almost smoking to-day; and if the present state of things goes on, you cannot tell, sir, how long it will be before they will again be seized and destroyed by rebels. I am willing to appropriate the money that may be necessary to protect the public property at Norfolk and Pensacola, but I am unwilling to go further. Hereafter if the States that have been engaged in the rebellion shall come back into the Union, if they shall prove themselves loyal and true to the Constitution and flag, then it may be well to consider in the light of the public interest whether it would be best to rebuild these yards. But at the present time I am opposed to these appropriations inaugurating the policy of re-establishing them.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the House that during this discussion I have sat silent for a greater portion of the time. I have done so, not because I was uninterested in the work which the committee have been doing yesterday and to-day, but because I desired to see how far it would proceed in the way of defining a policy for the administration of the Navy, and whether in the progress of the discussion anything amounting to a system of naval administration should be developed. I have found nothing of that kind; and it is for that reason, and because this branch of the public service has seemed to be regarded as of small importance to us, either in our domestic or in foreign relations, that I wished to say what I have already said and what I shall add.

Now, sir, gentlemen argue the question of appropriations for these navy-yards on the theory that they are State institutions, and as if it were true that in making an appropriation to a naval station at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, or Boston, or New York, or Philadelphia, or Norfolk, or Pensacola, we were making appropriation to the respective States or local communities where they are located. Why, sir, these appropriations are no more made for those local communities than are the appropriations that are made to build forts for the national defense at points where our coast is vulnerable.

There is no argument whatever that has been made in favor of withholding appropriations for these navy-yards that will not apply with equal force to withholding appropriations from United States arsenals and forts within the rebel lines. Are gentlemen prepared to say that this Government has not power enough to protect itself and its property in its navy-yards and in its forts and arsenals? If that be so, then the time has come indeed when it would not be wise to make appropriations for our naval stations.

But our ships are not upon one ocean only or one part of the seas; they are scattered where ever our commerce goes. Where our commerce goes there our ships must be. It is contrary to all economical theories and all economical facts that your ships shall be brought from all parts of the world to one point for repairs.

As to the particular appropriation for the navy-yard at Pensacola, it is not to build a navy-yard. It is to keep in condition what we have now there, for the purpose of repairing vessels attached to the Gulf and West India squadrons, and such other vessels as are in the waters adjacent thereto.

Let me say the argument in favor of bringing these vessels to New York and other places has lost all force since you have stricken out the appropriations necessary to keep those yards in an efficient condition. Let me tell you that if we have been able to sustain the Navy during the war it is partly because we have had all the private yards in the country to assist us. Without them the navy-yards would have been insufficient to sustain the Navy. Do gentlemen want to estimate the comparative cost of repairing ships and engines in public and in some private establishments? Let them look at the bills recently investigated and returned to the Navy Department, and they will be abundantly satisfied.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish the committee to be disturbed by the eloquent remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs on the unpreparedness of our Navy to meet the armed Powers of Europe. The House will recollect that last year, during the discussion which occupied some two or three days in reference to the management of the Navy Department during the war, the question then to be determined was whether or not the large expenditures of money made under that Department had been properly made, and whether or not we had brought our Navy to that condition of preparedness, not only for the suppression of the rebellion, but for that great foreign war which we all then anticipated. My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE,] the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, then demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House that in that great naval battle, when should be arrayed on one side all the power which centuries of effort have culminated in the navy of Great Britain, and on the other, the Navy of the United States, we would be in no danger; that in that great battle, the flag of the United States, now happily the flag of one common country, would float in triumph over a beaten and submissive foe.

I agreed with him then. And the same force that was to achieve such brilliant results then we have now. The Monadnock and the Ironsides, the Dictator and the Puritan, with their invulnerable associates, could now achieve the results we then predicted for them. For aggress-sive as well as for defensive purposes our Navy may still be relied upon. The expenditures of the Department have been well made, and notwithstanding the alarms of my friend from Massachusetts, I have entire confidence that in any conflict that may arise the country will have no occasion to regret the confidence it places in our naval heroes.

Now, in regard to this navy-yard at Pensacola. We are told that it is simply for repairs. The repairs done at that yard are done at an expensive rate. If it be proposed to appropriate only for temporary repairs the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will answer.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, for the purpose of closing debate, that the committee rise.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a single moment, that I may say a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. STEVENS. I must insist on my motion. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867, had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill all debate upon the pending section shall terminate in half a minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the House had ordered all debate on the pending section to close in half a minute.

The question being taken on the amendment to strike out lines two hundred and nineteen and twenty-two and insert in lieu thereof, "for the preservation of the property of the United States at the Pensacola navy-yard, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $20,000;" it was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend by striking out in lines two hundred and thirty-nine and two hundred and forty the item "$10,500" and inserting "$11,000."

Mr. STEVENS. The question is not open to debate.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not understand the motion as cutting off debate on the whole bill—only on that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Speaker of the House inquired of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] what his motion was, and he answered that it was on that section; and there being but one section in the bill the Chair rules that all debate is cut off.

Mr. STEVENS. It was on the section, and there is but one section in the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I move to reconsider that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not competent. Mr. ROGERS. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] press his amendment?

Mr. ROGERS. Not if I am not allowed to speak.

The reading of the bill having been concluded,

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer two additional sections to this bill. I will state in advance that they call for no appropriations in money whatever, while they will enable the accounting officers of the Treasury in one case to settle their books properly, and in the other case to equalize the distribution of bounties for the destruction of enemies' vessels which have been already passed by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. This proceeds by unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole, because amendments are not debatable.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I offer to amend by adding the following as a new section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the first section of the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved May 21, 1864, as appropriates $250,000 for bounties for the destruction of enemies' vessels, as per act of July 17, 1862, be amended so that said appropriations shall be applied to all cases of destruction of enemies' vessels during the recent rebellion, and at the same rate as is provided for in the act to which reference is made.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish to make a point of order. I hope the gentleman will not press it here.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will not object. This is merely explanatory of an appropriation that has already been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order, as it only regulates an appropriation previously made.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Is debate in order on this?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; the proposition was received by unanimous consent.

The motion to add the foregoing section was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I offer the following as another amendment:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of settling the accounts of disbursing officers of the Navy, prior to the passage of the act making appropriations for the fiscal years 1863 and 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer from the appropriation for pay of the Navy to the appropriation for contingencies, the sum of $265,404 12.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That certainly cannot be in order under any rule that ever existed on the face of the earth.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. That relates to appropriations that—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is in the nature of a private claim.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. It is not an appropriation of one dollar. The object of the section is to save an appropriation of $245,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. And the Chair will rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have an amendment to offer to come in at the end of line twenty-seven on page 2.

Mr. STEVENS. You cannot go back to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not competent for the committee to go back to any portion of the bill that has been passed. An amendment in the form of an additional section to the bill would be in order.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Then I offer it as an additional section to the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows: No portion of the amount herein appropriated shall be paid in violation of the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 122, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1867, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire whether if this bill is now postponed till to-morrow, it will come up before any other business after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. If the House passes from its consideration now, it will go upon the Speaker's table and can only be reached by a motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. As the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] desires to go on with the bankrupt bill to-day, I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow immediately after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES addressed the Chair.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield for that purpose.

No objection was made.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, the member from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] who used unparliamentary language in reference to myself is, I observe, in his seat, and I embrace the first opportunity since the publication of his speech to show him what my animus toward him was in the remark I made, and "that I had no desire to do him injustice or to impugn his honor." Here is his own language in the Globe. It presents the question of fact, and I read it:

"If you intend to arrest white people on the ex parte statements of negroes, and hold them to suit your convenience for trial, and fine and imprison them, then I say that I oppose you; and if you should so arrest and punish me, I would kill you when you set me at liberty."

Here is the person to whom the member referred. I read from his answer to a question put by the chairman of the select committee:

"I refer to Colonel McCaleb, as one of the men connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Kentucky, and he is the man whom I told that if he undertook to arrest me and my family as others had been arrested and punished I would kill him."

I give the member the full benefit of an explanation of his declaration that he would kill a white officer acting under oath and in the discharge of his duty, if that is a less unworthy act than to shoot an American citizen of African descent. That may not have been degrading to his State, and whether it was, as I said, language unbecoming an American officer is a question which I shall refer to the gallant soldiers of the State of Iowa who never fought, thank God! but upon one side, and whether it was language unbecoming an American officer I might refer to the code of the first of American generals, and to the greatest of American captains, the Lieutenant General of the United States.

I have nothing more to add, only to repeat that my animus toward the member was the kindest. I criticised barbarous laws and his language from a sense of duty, and I have given his own language in justice to him, although he first used the unparliamentary language toward me, which, as I repeat, I regarded as no offense.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I ask the gentleman to read his own language in reference to what I said.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have it here, and I will read it:

"This discussion is not plainly promotive of the most commendable temper. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] declared on Saturday, as I caught his language, that if he were arrested on the complaint of a negro and brought before one of the agents of this bureau, when he became free he would shoot him. Is that civilization? It is the spirit of barbarism that has too long dwelt in our land, the spirit of the infernal regions that brought on the rebellion and this war."

I further said, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH:]

"I occupied the Speaker's chair when the gentleman's colleague was speaking, and I heard the words; but the gentleman has seen fit, like other gentlemen, to withhold his speech for revision, and I cannot, therefore, refer to it. I have no desire to do him the least injustice or impugn his honor."

Mr. ROUSSEAU. It was to that language that I objected when I rose to a personal explanation the day before yesterday. This House will see at a glance the difference between a gentleman saying that he will protect his wife and children against outrage, of which I was speaking when I alluded to that matter, and saying that he would kill a person who should attempt to arrest him on the ex parte statement of a negro.

And when I got up here the other day, and said in my place that I used no such language, I meant just what I said, and in that regard the speech, as published, has been changed in no line, word, or letter, from what it was as reported by the reporters of the Globe who took it down.

The gentleman can have his own ideas as to what he would do if his wife and children were arrested in the evening, as was the case to which I was speaking, and ordered to be held by the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau until the morning to be tried, at his convenience. The gentleman can have his own notions; I have mine. And I say here that a man who would allow such outrages to be committed as I indicated the other day, would do what I would not do. Gentlemen undertook to correct me the other day when I said these things were done while the bureau was under the orders of General Fisk. The agent was in charge of the bureau there under the orders of General Fisk. Be that as it may, if any gentleman would allow his wife and children to be arrested and taken from him without law, and led away between two bayonets in the hands of negroes, and imprisoned during the night to be tried at the convenience of the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, he is at perfect liberty to do so; but I would not submit to it. I would resist it, and if bloodshed came of it, let it come. I hold that the freedom and liberty I claim to enjoy is worthless if my family and myself are to be taken away from my home under these circumstances.

This explanation, however, is a very small matter, and I do not wish to have these personal explanations taking up the time of the House in this way. I believe there is not a man upon this floor who would not indorse the sentiments I have uttered, that under any circumstances he would stand by his wife and children. And if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] chooses to tell the House here to-day that he does not indorse that sentiment, then let him do so; I shall not envy his position. He may attempt a fling at Kentucky by talking about fighting on both sides of this question. Kentucky does not care what he may say; and I must say I do not care one cent about anything he may say. But I will tell him one thing, that whether on the Union or on the rebel side, he cannot point to a Kentucky man who ever turned his back upon danger, or who has ever dishonored or degraded himself by deserting or failing to defend the cause he espoused.

And when that gentleman got up here the other day and said that I had degraded my State when I said I would defend my wife and children as well as myself from these outrages, he uttered what I then pronounced to be a slander, and what I now repeat to have been a slander. If I know myself, I know that I could do no act that would degrade either my friends, my family, or myself. And the language he then used was unnecessary and uncalled for; it was discourteous and unkind, and against the rules of this House, as I understand them. And I did not know what else to do than to get up in my place here and pronounce it false and a vile slander upon me; and that I did. And I think he should have done the same toward me, if I had assailed him in like manner. And what I accord to other men, I must and will claim for myself.

I regret that it is necessary to make these explanations. The language I did utter the other day, however, justified me in what I said here. If the gentleman had properly quoted my remarks I should have said nothing; but that he did not do. If there is a reporter here who will say that I have not given the true version of my remarks, that what is published is not just precisely what I uttered on this floor, then I will admit that I am wrong.

I hope to hear no more said about this matter. It is not worthy the attention of this House. I think enough was said about it the other day; more than I want to hear again.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have discharged my duty. I have allowed the member to report himself, and he does not seem disposed to take advantage of his own wrong to retract his words. He throws himself back upon his style of dignity, and he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I wish the gentleman would indicate what words he expects me to retract. I do not understand him.

Mr. GRINNELL. I have not asked the gentleman to retract anything. I simply wished to allow him an opportunity to explain himself by his own speech, to show what was the difference between his declaration and my statement of it. I thought that he said that he would shoot a negro, while it appears by his speech that in two instances he said that he would shoot a white officer of the United States while on duty. That is all the explanation I wish to make, and I am willing to stand in that position.

If the gentleman means to say that Kentucky is the only State whose sons do not turn their backs in the day of danger, then I apprise him that there are other States northward whose sons I defend from cowardice. It is not for me to boast that I belong to the profession of gory Mars, and I have not had much experience in fast running, but trust I have a comfortable amount of that quality which means standing still and both awaiting and meeting the consequences of my acts and words at home and abroad.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the gentleman to become defender of the troops from the free States. I simply wish to say that I have made no reflection upon the soldiers of the various States. I have fought with them, sir, and I only wish that the gentleman from Iowa had been willing to be present to see how bravely and gallantly the troops from his own State and all the free States deported themselves in time of battle. I have fought with those men; I know them; and I would rather die than cast a reflection upon them.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say with reference to this question. I simply wish to make a correction of the report of my own speech telegraphed from this city by the Associated Press.

I am reported as having said that Kentucky was the most disloyal of all the rebel States. I am correctly reported in the Globe. My remark was that Kentucky has been one of the most disloyal.

A MEMBER. There is not much difference.

Mr. McKEE. I do not wish to withdraw that remark. I only mean to add that that State has not only been one of the most disloyal, but one of the most troublesome of all the disloyal; and she is the only State which has now practically succeeded by her legislation in carrying out the doctrine of secession. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENCKES. I think that the House will thank me for having yielded to these gentlemen; for we have now obtained an exact definition of the position of Kentucky; and I hope it will be ever remembered.

I desire now to call up the special order, the bankrupt bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, what is the position of the loan bill? As I understand, that bill was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The loan bill was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour; but in accordance with the usages of the House, the bankrupt bill having been made a special order previously, antedates the loan bill, which will come up as soon as the bankrupt bill shall have been disposed of.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the special order, the bill (H.

R. No. 7) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. JENCKES. I wish now to move the adoption of the amendments reported by the committee. All of those amendments except two are merely corrections of the printing, or are designed to make the provisions of the bill more clear. Two of the amendments are matters of substance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the bill as amended by the committee be offered as a substitute for the original bill. By this means the whole bill will be open to amendment, while otherwise only amendments to the amendments could be offered.

Mr. JENCKES. I thank the Chair for the suggestion; and I now offer the bill as amended by the committee as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Rhode Island. A number of gentlemen have suggestions to make and possibly amendments to offer to the different sections of the bill; and I suggest that by unanimous consent the bill be considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and be read by sections for amendment and debate.

Mr. JENCKES. The only objection to that is in the time that would be consumed in the reading of this long bill; it consists of over fifty sections.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman has the right at this time to have the bill read.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not propose that there shall be any waste of the time of the House. All I desire is that the reading of the bill may be by sections, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, so that amendments and suggestions may be made, and the whole subject be presented intelligibly to the consideration of members.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and read by sections for amendment, on which the five minutes' debate will be in order.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed Senate bill No. 80, for the relief J. B. Rittenhouse, fleet paymaster of the Pacific squadron; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions and bill of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad;

Joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the payment of the expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America; and

An act (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mrs. Mary Lincoln;

When the Speaker signed the same.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER presented a deposition in the case of S. H. Boyd vs. John R. Kelso; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

BANKRUPT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, before the bill is read I desire to submit a few remarks opening the debate.

This bill is the result of the careful study of the subject by two select committees of this House, and of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in the last Congress. It may also be said to be the result of the studies of previous committees of Congress, who, in the light of the previous experience of this country and of other commercial countries, have endeavored to provide for the necessities of our merchants and men of business. It is an attempt to establish the law of debtor and creditor upon an equal and just system, based upon the Constitution, and which shall have a salutary and satisfactory operation in all parts of our country.

The bill has been printed in large editions and liberally distributed throughout the country. Abstracts of it have been published in most of the newspapers, and in all of the legal periodicals. Every lawyer and man of business in the country has had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with its provisions. Many suggestions in amendment have been received from practical men, which have been duly considered and many of them accepted.

Since the bill was reported in the last Congress, its provisions have also received consideration in other countries. One fact is sufficiently illustrative of the commendation which it has received. In the last Parliament of Great Britain a select committee of the House of Commons had the question of the revision of their system of bankruptcy under consideration, and out of twenty-one propositions of amendment, eighteen were identical with the leading provisions embodied in the bill before the last Congress.

One criticism frequently made upon the bill is that it is too long and elaborate. But it should be remembered that it contains a code of positive law—embracing the relations of debtor and creditor in every State—superseding the local laws, and intended to be uniform and national in its operation. It has been deemed necessary, therefore, to set forth clearly every proposition that relates to the rights and remedies of parties affected by the system. All that relates to mere formalities of proceeding has been omitted, and provision made for the preparation of a code of rules which shall be the same in every court. With the simple and uniform machinery thus provided for, it is believed that the objections made to the operation of previous statutes will be entirely overcome.

Every commercial nation has adopted a system of bankrupt laws. It is too late to argue upon the soundness of the principle upon which such laws are founded. To question it would be to question the results of the experience of the whole world for centuries.

The bill is framed to take effect upon the business of the country as it now exists. Time is given for the framing and circulation of the code of rules, and for the men of business of the country to become acquainted with its provisions. When it once goes into operation it is believed it will become the basis of a permanent system. The careful manner in which the bill has been prepared and revised by the committees which have had the subject in charge; the length of time that the measure has been before the country; the universal favor in which it has been received by all mercantile interests; the general advocacy of the press; the intrinsic value and unquestionable good of the system, and the common consent that the present is a most favorable time for its introduction, induce me to take up no more time in opening the debate, but to ask that the bill may now be put upon its passage.

Mr. HALE. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the select committee whether it is proposed to bring this bill to a final vote to-day?

Mr. JENCKES. It will not be possible to do so.

Mr. HALE. There are many things, while approving the general idea of the bill, which, in the brief examination I have made of it, require amendment at least for its security and fair working in certain localities, depending on the size of the districts; and there are also other questions as to the practical details of the bill I think we ought fairly to consider.

Mr. JENCKES. It was for that purpose I agreed that the bill should be considered as in the Committee of the Whole, and read by sections for amendment.

Mr. HALE. Will time be allowed for the consideration of these matters?

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for the amendment, on which the five minutes' debate will be in order.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand it is necessary to move an amendment in order to be entitled to speak on the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act: and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as a court of equity. The powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court, or by any justice thereof, in term time or vacation. Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee: but no suit at law or in equity shall, in any case, be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued, for or against such assignee: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike that section out.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the bill is now being read for information.

The SPEAKER. No; for amendment. The general debate will be in order when the bill has been gone through with for amendment, under the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, which was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I make this motion for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the select committee what object is gained by giving concurrent jurisdiction to the Federal circuit and district courts. I fail to see any desirable object that is attained over what would be attained if the jurisdiction were confined to the district courts. It is well known that in practice ordinarily now the circuit courts are held by the district judges. It is very seldom that a justice of the Supreme Court is associated with a district judge. And it seems to me that there are objections to retaining the provisions of this section, by which any case of bankruptcy may, upon application of any party interested, be forced into the circuit court instead of the district court. In the northern district of New York, for instance, where I reside, there is a large territory. The circuit court is limited in its terms to, I think, only two, and at two points, practically, in the district. So that the party of the creditors may, by application of the adverse party bringing the case into the circuit court instead of the district court, be driven to a distance of four or five hundred miles to preserve their rights under this bill.

I simply desired to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this fact.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] would compare the language of this section carefully with that of the first section, he would see that there are many cases which could be very much speeded in the hearing and decision, by giving concurrent jurisdiction to the circuit courts. The first section provides that all original proceedings in bankruptcy—that is, all relating to bankruptcy itself, the discharge of the bankrupt, and questions growing out of his personal relations to his creditors—shall be first heard and determined there. But in regard to questions arising in the settlement of his estate, it may be to the advantage of all parties to have proceedings instituted in the circuit court and carried through as rapidly as possible. Thus, for instance, a great many cases arise in the settlement of a bankrupt's estate which can only be prosecuted in the equity side of the court. This gives to the assignee power to institute proceedings in the circuit court, or gives the claimant the right to institute a suit against him, and thus place his case under the rule of practice of the circuit court of the United States, as established by the code laid down by the Supreme Court, and puts forward the case to an early decision, giving either of the parties an opportunity to carry it up by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. These sections are framed so that one is the complement of the other, and with a view, not of hindering proceedings or embarrassing anybody, but getting speedy action before the highest tribunal.

There are numerous terms of the district court, and two terms of the circuit court in all the districts. There are at least four terms of the district to two of the circuit court. It may be very desirable to have a suit brought in the circuit court, as one of the judges of the Supreme Court may sit there for the purpose of speeding the ultimate decision of the cause in the Supreme Court. If brought into the district court it has to be taken by appeal to the circuit court, or by writ of error if it is a suit at law. I hope the gentleman from New York will be satisfied that it is to aid in the administration of law, and not with a view to delay that this provision is made.

Mr. HALE. I wish simply to see if I misunderstood the provision of the bill, when I understood that by this section concurrent jurisdiction is given to the circuit court in all proceedings throughout.

Mr. JENCKES. Not in all. In that the gentleman is mistaken. If he will look at the first section he will find that the district court has jurisdiction upon all matters relating to the personal relations of the bankrupt with his creditors, and the circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction in all cases that relate to the property of the bankrupt.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired. The question is on striking out the section.

Mr. CONKLING. I move, as an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. HALE,] with a view of perfecting the section which he proposes to strike out, to strike out from the commencement of the section down to the word "assign," in the seventeenth line, as follows:

That the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act: and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as a court of equity. The powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court, or by any justice thereof, in term time or vacation. Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee.

As I understand this section, despite the explanation of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] it does give, to a very large extent, original and concurrent jurisdiction with the district court, and I call his attention to the language of the section commencing at the end of line ten:

Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by any such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee.

It seems to me that this whole section is useless in its practical working in any district with which I am familiar.

I will mention as an illustration the district in which I live; and I avail myself of this opportunity to say that I do not believe this bill can be put into operation at all in the State of New York, as regards the largest district of that State, unless some judicial machinery is to be created that is not provided for in the bill.

The circuit court and the district court are practically the same thing in that district, because the justice of the Supreme Court does not sit; it is the district judge all round.

I do not forget that the gentleman provides for what under the English system are called registrars, and what are here called registers, to do clerical, chamber business. I remember that when I say that this bill, in my judgment, cannot be executed in the northern district of New York, whether with or without this section, because in either event the litigation to which it gives rise is to go up before the district judge, and business has so accumulated in that district within the last two or three years that no man can execute the provisions of this bill.

In addition to that, I concur with my colleague [Mr. HALE] in the objection he makes to this section, because the only effect, waiving the question whether it can be executed or not, is to carry parties from Albany to Buffalo and from Buffalo to Albany, to the end that they may say, in name and in form, now we are in the circuit court although we are before the same actual tribunal.

So, Mr. Speaker, I object to this section, first, as being unnecessary, inasmuch as it duplicates the jurisdiction conferred; and I object to it further upon a ground which goes more or less to all the other sections of this bill, namely, that without some additional machinery the bill itself cannot be executed either in the district court alone or in the district and circuit courts both.

Mr. SLOAN. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and in doing so, I entirely dissent from the statement made by him, that the district court of the United States and the circuit court of the United States are the same thing. I do not undertake to say what may be the condition of those two courts in the State of New York, or in the district to which the gentleman refers, but I undertake to say that in the State of Wisconsin, and in other States, those courts are distinct and different courts.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman has entirely misapprehended what I said.

Mr. SLOAN. I did not misapprehend the gentleman. In theory, of course, he understands that they are distinct; but I understand him to say that in practice the district judge holds the circuit court.

Mr. CONKLING. I mean to say precisely this, that so far as business accumulated in the Supreme Court of the United States, that the circuit judges, in other words, the justices of the Supreme Court, do not, and, from the nature of the case cannot, to any extent sit in the circuit court.

Mr. SLOAN. I so understand the gentleman; but while these courts are theoretically distinct, they are also practically distinct and different tribunals in the State of Wisconsin, and I believe in other States. A justice of the Supreme Court holds the circuit court; and one of the main merits of this bill, in my judgment, is that this section leaves a choice to parties whether they will have their rights determined by the district or the circuit court. There is danger that if exclusive jurisdiction were given to one court a district judge of any peculiarity of mind might endeavor to carry out the law upon strange principles.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I will remind him that under the old law the district judge of Missouri held that the act was unconstitutional, and he would not open his court.

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly. And the giving the right to persons to choose the tribunal, and in important cases to appeal to the circuit courts of the United States, where the justices of the Supreme Court sit to determine upon their rights, is, in my judgment, one of the great merits of this bill. I should be very reluctant to see suitors, whose interests were involved in these proceedings, confined exclusively to the district courts. I admit that as a general thing their operations might perhaps not be prejudicial to the interests of litigants. But there certainly ought not to be any objection to giving litigants the right to go into the higher tribunals, and the preferable tribunals in some States, for the purposes of justice. And I trust that no amendment will be favored by this House which at all impairs or interferes with the right of the circuit court to exercise concurrent jurisdiction and supervision over this matter. If the bill went further in that direction it would meet my approbation still more.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment. And I will now move to amend the section by striking out all down to the end of the fourteenth line. I do so for the purpose of saying a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.]

I understand that there is a local reason in the State of Wisconsin why the circuit judge does sit, and the district judge does not; or if the district judge does sit why causes are not brought before him with as much alacrity as they are before the circuit judge. That is a local reason.

Now, look for one moment at the operation of this bill elsewhere, so as to test the validity of the general assertion and argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin. Take the State of New York as an illustration, where there is nothing local that I am aware of, one way or the other, bearing upon this question, except the geographical extent of the district. Suppose that there some man, either the bankrupt himself or the creditor wishing to collude with the bankrupt, or having some motive of fraud in some way, proposes that proceedings shall take place in the circuit court; and the parties interested live in the county of Erie, or the county of Chautauqua, or the county of Niagara, or anywhere in the western part of the State. The proposition practically is that witnesses, counsel, parties, creditors, a crowd of people, are to be driven three hundred and twenty-five miles to find a term of the court.

Or if it takes place at another season of the year, and if it is applicable to the only other term, the parties may live in the northeastern part of the State, while the term is to sit in the county of Ontario, or the county of Onondaga. Thus the parties are to be carried a distance of four hundred and fifty miles to get into an appellate jurisdiction, to get before a different tribunal; to get not their rights—not to make one hair white or one hair black, not at all—but to get, in truth, before the same identical judge, with no other right but to have the same form of proceeding and the same result.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] if the circuit courts in New York are not held in the same places as the district courts?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir. On the contrary, so seldom are circuit courts held, so much have they become a shadow, so far as relates to the idea of their being held by the judges of the Supreme Court, that a bill is now pending in the Senate to abolish them altogether, to sweep them away, because it is impossible for the judges of the circuit court to hold them. In the district where I live, I believe there are but three terms appointed of the circuit court. One of them is absolutely a shadow, and the other two are held by the district judge. So that in truth it is nothing but the same court in another name, with this fact added, that the circuit court is held but twice a year, and then at positions far from each other. The district court, however, is dotted about in so many localities, and is so frequent in occurrence, as to lessen very greatly the evils of which I speak.

Mr. JENCKES. The reasons stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] for striking out the portion of the section which he has indicated are precisely the reasons which influence the committee in inserting it. The district of New York is undoubtedly the most difficult to manage of all the districts in the United States. The remedy for the difficulty is not in making provisions for that district alone, and causing inconvenience to all the rest of the districts in the United States, but in dividing that district. The reason which the gentleman dwells most upon is this: they have now in that district but four terms of the district court in which to try cases arising under this act or any other. By giving the circuit court jurisdiction in these cases they have six terms; and if the same judge holds both courts, there will be six chances for the trial of a case, where, under the plan suggested by the gentleman, there would be but four. Nor will any peculiar inconvenience be experienced in this class of cases by reason of the extent of the territory. The same difficulty exists now in all revenue and all admiralty cases, and in every case of which that court has exclusive jurisdiction under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman be good enough to explain how the northern district of New York differs in this respect from the whole of Kentucky, for example, a district by itself, or half of Ohio, a district by itself, or various other districts equal or nearly so in territorial extent?

Mr. JENCKES. I think the gentleman is mistaken about Kentucky; and certainly in Ohio there are three districts.

Several MEMBERS. Two.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] says that there is only one district in Kentucky.

Mr. JENCKES. Well, perhaps Kentucky may come in the same category as the northern district of New York; but the remedy for that is to divide the district. As I understand, a bill has been presented, or is to be presented, for the purpose of correcting that evil in the northern district of New York.

The gentleman makes one other suggestion; and as I suppose I shall have to meet it several times, I will just hint at it now. It is that other machinery than that provided in the bill is required. I think, however, that if the gentleman will examine the matter closely he will find that sufficient machinery has been provided. All the formal business in these proceedings will be done by officers called registers. Every issue in law which parties may raise in any case will be made up and stated by the register and certified to the court; and if a question is not of sufficient importance to justify parties in going three hundred miles to try it, they would be very foolish to have it stated and certified. If parties choose to have a case tried in which the question is frivolous, the burden is thrown upon them, not upon the courts or the officers of the courts.

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted upon this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw it.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HALE, to amend by striking out the second section, it was not agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to amend the third section by striking out in the nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second lines the following words:

And he shall, in open court, take and subscribe the oath prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

Mr. JENCKES. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether, if those words be stricken out, the officers who may be appointed under this bill would not be obliged to take the oath required by the provisions of that act of 1862?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not see how that could be.

Mr. JENCKES. That act applies to all civil officers.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well, then; if that oath is now required to be taken under an act already in force, then it is unnecessary to insert here any provision for the taking of that oath.

But that is not the ground on which I propose to strike at this portion of the bill. My reason for making this motion is that I regard the requirement of this test oath as odious, unjust, and despotic. I object to the provision of the bill, because it is intended to prevent any person in the South who has been in any way engaged in the rebellion from occupying a position under this bill. It will exclude all persons in the South who have given any aid or comfort to the rebellion, or who have been in any manner engaged in it, or who have held any position under the confederate government, no matter how unwillingly such persons may have participated in the rebellion. It may prove difficult or impossible to find in the southern States persons who are able to take this test oath. Some Departments of the Government have already found it necessary to dispense with that oath in order to carry on the machinery of the Government in the southern States.

I oppose this upon another ground: that a test oath of this kind is unconstitutional, that there is no authority in the Constitution of the United States to the Congress to inflict upon the consciences of any men any oath in regard to the support of the Federal Government except the oath laid down in the Constitution of the United States itself. It is an oath to support that Constitution; and any obligation attempted to be inflicted upon people by virtue of an act of Congress, different from that contemplated in the Constitution, is not binding upon the conscience, is in violation of law, is an infringement on liberty, an effort of despotism to strike down a people because they have disagreed with us on great political questions, and have seen fit to take up arms in defense of the position they occupied.

I am opposed to this, sir, for the reason that I want to restore harmony and good feeling to every section of the country. I do not want to see any more laws passed, after peace has been proclaimed and war has been declared to have ceased, making a discrimination against any person, whether that person was engaged in the rebellion or not. I hold that under the general amnesty and the manner in which they have been treated by the President of the United States, that immaculate man who has attempted to defend the integrity of the whole country and to restore it to its former grandeur, it is an infringement on the part of Congress to prevent persons, merely and simply because they have been engaged in rebellion, from holding office under this bankrupt law.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the motion to strike out.

Mr. ROGERS. I modify my amendment as follows: I move to strike out the words "the oath prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes, approved July 2, 1862,' and in lieu thereof to insert:

An oath that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and will faithfully perform the duties of said office according to law.

It seems to me, unless the gentleman wants to make a distinction between individuals situated in different parts of the country, in violation of the Constitution, he will be satisfied with the amendment I have offered.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the fourth section.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to strike out the first line, for the purpose of calling the attention of gentlemen who are interested in this bill to a feature which begins here. If the gentleman from Rhode Island is right in the suggestion that he made when he was up before, that they are to divide the districts and make requisite arrangements to bring into being men enough to carry this act into operation, it is well that the House should begin to understand this bill in this one section, implies, if it is to be carried out, an unlimited number of officers.

Mr. JENCKES. They are to be limited by the fees.

Mr. CONKLING. It provides that it shall be the duty of the circuit judges of the United States to appoint in such districts one or more registers in bankruptcy. It is only limited by the option and the discretion of the judge. It may be one and it may be one hundred.

Mr. JENCKES. It is limited also by the fund from which these registers are to receive compensation.

Mr. CONKLING. It does not meet the point raised, that it gives the judge the power to appoint as many officers as he chooses, and for any purpose whatever. When appointed they can do nothing but what any clerk can do.

They are to perform an office which is purely clerical. They are to do chamber business, ex parte business, which the clerk or deputy clerk can do now. My objection is, that here is a corps of officers to be brought into existence useless for the purposes prescribed, to whom jurisdiction should be given, if they are to be created at all, to hear and determine litigated questions. The amendment, therefore, it seems to me, belongs either to this section or to the next. If these registers are to be appointed, then the next section should be so amended as to make them useful for some practical purpose, whereas now they perform a mere clerical duty which otherwise could be discharged by clerks or deputy clerks of the court.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman is under a misapprehension about the duties of these officers, and I wish to meet the objection here because we shall have to consider it hereafter. He says the duties may be performed by the clerks of the court. But the clerks are local. Take the northern district of New York. They are located at Utica and Buffalo; they cannot leave their offices. But suppose there are a dozen causes prepared in Ogdensburg, in Plattsburg, and elsewhere, then the judge of the northern district of New York, upon application of the parties or the counsel in those cases, can send a register to either of those towns to meet the parties—the applicant for bankruptcy or the creditors or the assignee, whoever is contesting—and whatever they agree upon he can enter as the order of the court and carry it back to the clerk's office. It is to save this very trouble and difficulty that this class of officers is provided for. They are movable, not fixed. They travel about to suit the convenience of the parties having business in the courts, and do not oblige parties or counsel to travel two or three hundred miles for the sake of making a formal motion, where entry might be made by the clerk without the presence of the judge.

Thus all the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in his previous and last remarks may be overcome by these officers if they do their duty; and it is the interest of the courts to provide the best officers they can for that purpose, because if they do not, the business which the registers do not do will come back upon them, and they will have to hear and decide upon these matters of formality.

Mr. THAYER. I wish the gentleman would state while he is up whether these officers are not in point of law and of fact, judges; whether their functions are not judicial; whether they do not decree bankruptcy and have cognizance of questions of law; and whether a mere clerk of the court is ordinarily competent to discharge such duties.

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly; it requires that the persons shall be counselors of the court and learned in the law. This is taken from the English law. There are these officers in bankruptcy there; but they are fixed, and it is the strongest objection to the law of 1861, that parties were obliged to seek these registers' offices. And one of the amendments I alluded to in my opening remarks, that was proposed in the English House of Commons, was to make these officers movable.

Mr. DELANO. I have not had time or opportunity to examine the provisions of this bill. I should like to ask whether it is retroactive in its effects.

Mr. JENCKES. Certainly; it takes the business of the country as it finds it.

Mr. DELANO. Then I suggest whether the gentleman had not better be strict in what he proposes by his amendment. We shall certainly require all the agents to go on with this business that the bill provides for if we give it the latitude and breadth that is proposed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not see how it can be limited without—

The SPEAKER. The time has expired on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw it.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to strike out in lines twenty and twenty-one these words:

An act to prescribe the oath of office, and for other purposes, approved July 2, 1862.

That will simply leave persons to take the oath that is prescribed by law, and if there is any change afterward in the character of the oath necessary to be taken, it does not then become necessary to follow up this law or repeal it. I think that that will answer the purpose. I believe the chairman of the committee [Mr. JENCKES] fully understands that without this provision they would be required to take what is known as the test oath. And if that oath is subsequently changed, whatever the oath then may be, that is the one they would have to take. It is therefore unnecessary to incorporate this in this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not understand that the test-oath law is applicable to officers of this kind, if there was no provision for it in this bill, and I understand the chairman of the committee to say that he is willing to have this provision stricken out. I hope the House will not refuse to do so, as long as he is willing to have it done. I do not suppose the House wants to prevent anybody from acting in the position of registrar, or whatever the office is, in the southern States. Yet there are places, I suppose, where there is nobody living who could take the oath unless some person who has gone there from the North.

Mr. PRICE. I only want to say to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] who considers himself the special friend of the President, that the President has solemnly declared that he proposes as the rule of his future conduct that traitors shall be punished and treason made odious. And that is a part of what is accomplished by this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. The President has issued a general amnesty that extends to all persons who have not held civil offices under the confederate government, and to all persons in the military service under the rank of colonel. Now this bill goes further than that. It provides that no man, even those who have not held civil office under the confederate government, and military officers under the rank of colonel, shall hold this office without taking an oath that they have not aided the rebellion. Therefore, in the State of South Carolina, and some of the other States, it is not probable that a single person competent to perform the duties required by this bill can be found to take that oath; because every person of any capacity in those States has been engaged in this rebellion. Therefore I do not see how this bill is to have the Federal features it ought to have to extend all over the United States with this requirement in it. And if there is any loyal man in the southern States, though he may have gone from the North, he is as much entitled to the benefits of the provisions of this bill as any man in the North can be. And to whom is he to apply under this bill? He can apply to nobody there, unless some one is picked up in the North and sent down there to perform the duties prescribed by this bill.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to a point of order. My point is that this discussion is not relevant to any proposition before the House, but relates to a proposition that has been before the House and been voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] to strike out a part of the pending section.

Mr. ROGERS. The chairman of the committee from which this bill comes, [Mr. JENCKES,] I understand is willing that those lines shall be stricken out. If that is done it will leave the person who is to hold this position in the same situation as any other officer would be. If he comes within the requirements of the act requiring the test oath to be taken by him, then he will have to take it; otherwise he can discharge the duties of this office without being obliged to take that tyrannical and unconstitutional oath.

Now, I do not suppose the chairman of the select committee proposes to exclude persons from performing the duties required by the provisions of this bill, if they do not come within the provisions of the original act imposing that oath. I do not suppose that in time of peace, when the war is over and has been over for some seven or eight months, he intends to compel persons to take this test oath, which was only required to be taken in time of war, under the plea that it was necessary for the purpose of suppressing the rebellion. I do not suppose that we want to apply in time of peace this test oath any further than we did in time of war. And if a person who holds office under this bill does not come within the terms of the oppressive test-oath bill, why should you require him to take it, to do more than was required, tyrannically and unconstitutionally, of any one in time of war?

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out from the word "and" in the sixteenth line down to and including the word "court" in the twenty-first line, as follows:

And he shall also keep a docket of all cases in which he shall act, and make therein short memoranda of his action in all cases, which docket shall be kept in the office of the clerk of the district court, and shall form a part of the minute-book of the proceedings of said court;

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And he shall also make short memoranda of his proceedings in each case in which he shall act on a docket, to be kept by him for that purpose, and he shall from time to time, as proceedings are taken, forward to the clerk of the district court a copy of said memoranda, which shall be entered by the said clerk in a proper minute-book kept in his office.

As the section is now framed it provides that the register shall keep a docket in the office of the district court. Now, in a large district it is perfectly impossible that the register can keep a docket and enter memoranda of his proceedings in it in the office of the district court. The object of this amendment is to provide that from time to time, as proceedings are taken before the register, he shall forward to the clerk of the district court memoranda of those proceedings, and that the clerk shall enter them in a minute-book to be kept by him; which is practicable, while the other is not. It arrives at the same result that was arrived at by the committee in this section. It seems to me that as the section now stands it cannot be carried out in large districts.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. JENCKES. Is the object of his amendment to require the keeping of two dockets, one in the clerk's office and one by the register?

Mr. POMEROY. No; the register must necessarily keep at his own office the record of his own proceedings; but the official docket must be kept in the clerk's office as a matter of course. That is the source to which every person goes for information upon these subjects. The official register is the register kept by the clerk of the district court.

Mr. JENCKES. I think if the gentleman's amendment went a little further it would not be objectionable.

Mr. POMEROY. I will modify the amendment so as to make it acceptable to the chairman of the committee, provided that it will carry out the object.

Mr. JENCKES. The reason for this particular provision is this: that if the register of the court meets, at some place two or three hundred miles from the clerk's office, a dozen petitioners, and there is no objection to the entering of formal decrees, his act at that time is the act of the court, and that his minute-book or docket shall be carried back to the court and become a part of the records of the court; not that he shall keep a private docket of his own, but that the contemporaneous act, that which he does in the presence of the parties, shall be the record of the court. I cannot see any hardship in that.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment that I propose carries into effect the very result which the chairman of the committee aims at.

It is perfectly impossible, as I said before, that the register shall keep a docket in the office of the clerk, and all that he can by any possibility do is, wherever he may be, to keep a minute of his proceedings for his own information.

The amendment I propose provides that immediately upon any proceedings being taken before him, he shall send to the clerk of the district court a copy of those proceedings, which shall be entered in a minute-book to be kept by the clerk, and which minute-book is the regular docket of the proceedings. I do not see how it can be arrived at in any other way.

Mr. JENCKES. I see no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to my colleague that he insert the word "certified" before the word "copy."

Mr. JENCKES. And I suggest to him to insert the word "forthwith" before "forward."

Mr. POMEROY. I accept both modifications.

Mr. POMEROY's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out the word "administrative" in the thirteenth line, and the word "uncontested" in the fourteenth line; and also by striking out in lines twenty-four to thirty inclusive the following words:

Or to hear a disputed adjudication, or any question of the allowance or suspension of an order of discharge; but in all matters where an issue of fact or of law is raised and contested by any party to the proceedings before him, it shall be his duty to cause the question or issue to be stated by the opposing parties in writing, and he shall adjourn the same into court for decision by the judge.

My object, Mr. Speaker, in moving this amendment, is to enable the court to provide by proper rules for the transaction of business by these registers to a greater extent than it seems to me the bill now permits. I have a strong conviction that unless some provision of this kind be made, the insufficiency of the judicial force in the districts as now organized will render this bill substantially a nullity in practice so far as the larger districts are concerned. I believe that these subordinate officers may properly be clothed with powers much more ample than those to which they are limited by this bill. I believe that this may be done without raising any constitutional question. In many contested cases the constitutional objection which might perhaps be urged, that this register is a judicial officer appointed in a manner unwarranted by the Constitution, could undoubtedly be waived by the consent of the parties, as is done in the State of New York in proceedings before various officers. I desire that the provisions of this bill may be enlarged, so that judicial power may be conferred upon the register, at least whenever the parties desire to submit the question to him rather than be subjected to the expense of going to court.

Of course if this amendment be adopted, some further provisions relative to the powers of these registers may be necessary; but I believe that an amendment of this kind will be found absolutely essential to make this bill one that can be practically carried out in the larger districts.

Mr. JENCKES. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York should prevail and this bill should become a law, it would have the effect to create that class of officers called commissioners, who have been found so objectionable under every bankrupt law heretofore passed. The very object of the language which the gentleman moves to strike out was to prevent the establishment of any such courts of inferior jurisdiction. It was the intention that these registers should be administrative officers in every respect, except that they should be authorized to state questions for judicial decision, the object being to maintain uniformity of practice in the administration of the law.

If the gentleman will examine the bill a little further, he will find in section ten a provision by which commissioners, to be appointed by the Supreme Court, are authorized to establish rules of practice and a uniform code of procedure throughout the United States. Hence all that these registers will have to do will be to go round and meet the parties and their counsel, and make up the questions for the decision of the court. If the gentleman recollects the practice under the old law, he doubtless remembers that where questions of this kind were left to commissioners in the different counties—local tribunals like justices of the peace—there were as many different rules of practice, even in the same district, as the number of these inferior officers. It is highly essential, it appears to me, that a measure like this should come within the constitutional requirement, and should be uniform throughout all the districts in the United States, and all the offices in the various districts.

Mr. HALE. I submit, Mr. Speaker, whether the commissioners to be appointed by the Supreme Court could not as readily provide uniform regulations for the practice before these registers as provide uniform regulations for the several districts.

Mr. JENCKES. The effect of the gentleman's amendment would be that in many cases there would be two hearings, one before the commissioner, as the register would in fact become, and another before the judge. That is just what we want to avoid.

Mr. HALE. It may be that the honorable gentleman desires to avoid precisely what I wish to accomplish. I desire that there shall be within the reach of every party interested in these proceedings a tribunal before which he may be heard without involving an expenditure of time and money greater than the amount in controversy would justify. This advantage he cannot have under the bill as it stands.

Mr. JENCKES. Does not the gentleman see that under his plan there must be two hearings in every disputed case?

Mr. HALE. Not necessarily.

Mr. JENCKES. In nine cases out of ten there would be two hearings. But if the parties come before a competent register, a counselor of the court, whose duty it is to make up a case for the decision of the judge, and both parties agree upon his statement, and he certifies the issue, then there is but one hearing, and that is before the judge. In this way, the practice is uniform.

Mr. HALE. Does not the bill now provide that uncontested matters shall come before the register and be decided by him?

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman from New York and myself were on different sides of a case, and happened to meet three hundred miles from the place where the court was held, I have no doubt we could agree to a statement of law that the register should make up, so that when we come to court we shall have a definite issue to work upon. It would be as much for our interest as for the interest of the party.

The question recurred on Mr. HALE's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,500;" so that it will read:

The salaries of said registers shall be fixed by the judges of the circuit court, and shall not exceed in any case the sum of $2,500 per annum, in addition to the necessary traveling and incidental expenses, and shall be paid to the registers in each district, in the order of their appointment, out of the fees hereinafter required to be paid in the course of proceedings authorized by this act. No greater amount shall be paid for such salaries than shall be received for fees, and in case there shall be a surplus of fees after paying the salaries, such surplus shall be invested under the direction of the court to meet future deficiencies.

The subject of the amendment is the compensation of the registers. The compensation, as the House will perceive, is derived entirely from fees received in the several cases heard before them. It seems to me unjust to prescribe the same amount of compensation for different amounts of labor. It may happen that one register may do ten times the work of another register, and where the fees are actually received in excess he ought certainly to receive a larger compensation than where the register has a few cases before him.

The House will see by reference to the fourth section of the bill that the functions of these officers are important. They are not merely clerical; they are judicial in their character. He must be a lawyer, or he cannot discharge the duties imposed on the office with any satisfaction to the interests of the parties who are before him. Now to expect a lawyer, who is competent to decide these questions and pursue these investigations, should be willing to serve for the small sum to which he is limited is not to expect what is reasonable. I do not think that a class of men who are fit to discharge these responsible duties can be had for this sum. In the amendment I have proposed that the compensation shall not exceed $2,500. I suppose where a register of this kind is necessary his services will be worth that.

Mr. JENCKES. It is certainly one of the most difficult questions to fix the amount these officers should be paid. The idea was to make the bill self-sustaining, and that the officers should be paid out of the fees paid into court according to the labor, to be distributed fairly among the officers. The whole of their pay is under the direction of the judges. The clerk knows from the docket how many cases are entered in different places, and the judge can direct so many registers to this place and so many to another, so that a fair division may be made among them. And their traveling and other incidental expenses are paid.

If the gentleman will reflect a moment, it will occur to him that $2,500 is more than we pay the district judges. The district judge of Connecticut gets only $2,500, and he has to pay his own expenses.

Mr. THAYER. I think that the duties of these officers will be more laborious than those of the district judges.

Mr. JENCKES. Perhaps they will. But, sir, they will be attachés of the court and will have an opportunity to practice in a great many cases besides those in bankruptcy. It will be very easy, I think, to obtain the services of competent persons in the different districts, who, for the purpose of obtaining practice and skill under this act, if it become a law, will be willing to take the offices at a very low compensation.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. THAYER, it was not agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend in line forty-two, after the word "paid," by inserting the words, "by the clerk of the district court." That is evidently the intention of the bill, because the subsequent sections say that these fees are to be paid by the court.

Mr. JENCKES. I have no objection to accepting that amendment.

The amendment was accordingly made.

Mr. DAVIS. I move a verbal amendment in the forty-first line, by inserting the word "necessary" before the word "incidental."

Mr. JENCKES. No objection to that.

The amendment was accordingly made.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move to strike out the word "register" where it occurs in section five; or I will qualify it by moving to strike out the same word wherever it occurs in the bill.

I make this proposition that I may get some little information on this subject, not having had the benefit derived from the discussion of the bill at the former session. If I understand the provisions of the bill it is intended to give jurisdiction to the United States court of all matters relating to the estate of bankrupts, whether these questions arise between citizens of a particular State or between citizens of different States. In other words, I understand it to add largely to the jurisdiction of the United States court—to take from the State courts a large amount of business which now belongs exclusively to those courts.

Now, sir, in the State in which I live we have, I believe, two United States courts associated at a point very distant from portions of the district. If I understand the effect of this bill it refers to the United States courts the adjudication of all questions pending in the State courts the moment the act of bankruptcy is committed. For instance, if an ejectment suit is pending in a certain court between parties, and either of the parties commits the act of bankruptcy, that very moment all proceedings in that court are suspended, relating to that particular cause, and all other causes of the suitors who may be prosecuting this debtor.

Mr. JENCKES. I beg to correct the gentleman. This bill takes effect upon the relation of debtor and creditor. It has nothing to do with real actions.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I stand corrected. Then suppose a bankrupt has an interest in a lawsuit relating to a tract of land. The suit will have to be determined in the State courts, while at the same time his estate may be entirely administered upon by this register at the United States court; but all his personal property is transferred to the jurisdiction of the United States court.

Now, sir, I will undertake to say if this bill passes, that it will be extremely inconvenient to my constituents. In place of resorting to our State courts for a remedy against a man who has purchased a large amount of produce and who has failed to make the final payment, this bill requires the parties to travel hundreds of miles, perhaps to Chicago, or lose their claim.

I understand further that the register who may administer upon a gentleman's estate may be a lawyer who has been counsel in the State courts. For I call attention to the fact that if these registers are qualified in this way, they must be lawyers of some court of record in the State, or in the United States court. They cannot be interested in any case in their own district, but they may be interested in the State courts before the case is transferred to the jurisdiction of the United States court.

Now, sir, I will express the opinion that if this bill is to meet the approbation of the people, it must enable the people to have an adjudication of their rights in their home courts and not transfer them to courts at a great distance from their homes where their business is transacted and where under the State laws these questions are now determined. I will not add anything more.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the committee must have used language very inaccurately if they have conveyed any such idea as that stated by the gentleman. I think it is provided in about as clear a manner as can be that these registers shall not act as counsel or attorneys for any parties in any matters connected with bankruptcy. And, sir, instead of creating the difficulty which the gentleman suggests, their office is created to remove that very difficulty. Instead of the gentleman's neighbors having to travel two hundred miles to Chicago, this bill authorizes the court to come down, by means of one of these registers, into his neighborhood, and instead of creating the embarrassment which the gentleman has referred to, it will have a tendency to relieve it entirely.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I understand that in all cases of dispute the register has no jurisdiction and must refer them to the court.

Mr. JENCKES. Instead of increasing the difficulties of litigation, this machinery, if it will get well at all, will simplify the trial of every case, whether it be one growing out of the ownership of land or of common debts; because it brings all matters relating to the settlement of a bankrupt's estate within one jurisdiction at one place, and does not oblige his creditors to travel all over the country to pursue him in different courts wherever he may be found; everything is to be adjudicated at the place of his residence by a court of competent jurisdiction, and that lessens litigation instead of increasing it in almost every instance.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague to withdraw that motion to allow me to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw it for that purpose.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS IN OHIO.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the improvement of certain harbors in Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOLDING EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to make a privileged motion. I find there are several religious and other meetings that gentlemen wish to attend. I therefore move that the order of the House for night sessions be suspended until next week Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered a recess to be taken each day at four o'clock and thirty minutes until otherwise ordered. It is under the control of the majority of the House at any time to suspend or change the order.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to. Mr. SPALDING resumed the floor.

REVENUE REPORT.

Mr. WARNER. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the revenue commission appointed to inquire into and report upon the best and most efficient means of raising and collecting a revenue be requested to report to the House of Representatives such portion of the testimony relative to the industry and revenue of the country taken by them as they may deem expedient.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to say that this information—

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot give way any further.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman will hear a suggestion.

Mr. SPALDING. I must decline to yield.

Mr. WARNER. I appeal to the gentleman's courtesy for one moment. This resolution comes from the committee—

Mr. SPALDING. I decline to yield.

Mr. WARNER. Then I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I renew the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes to five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 9, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. H. C. FISH, D. D., of Newark, New Jersey.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hold in my hand the certificate of election of Hon. George S. Houston, as Senator from the State of Alabama for the term ending March 4, 1867. I hope that it may be received and laid on the table; and I deem it proper to state at this time that I understand that Mr. Houston has been a consistent Union man during the war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of a grant of lands to perfect the navigation of the Mississippi river to the falls of St. Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of steamboat and slack-water navigation on the Zombro river, from the Mississippi river to the Zombro falls, in Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of J. C. Rankin, and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the revenue laws, both as applied to internal taxation and duties on foreign imports, as will secure the amplest protection to American labor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the taxes upon the sales of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GUTHRIE presented the petition of Edward Lynch, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized and directed to issue an American register to the British colonial-built steamer Prince Albert; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented sixteen petitions, signed by six hundred and seventy-four citizens of the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States changing the basis of representation; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of James Tetlow, praying for relief for losses sustained by him in building for the Government on contract the iron steamer tug-boats Fortune, Speedwell, Standish, and Mayflower; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 85) for the disposal of the public lands for homestead and actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 154) to further secure American citizens certain privileges under the treaty of Washington, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 137) to amend the acts approved August 6, 1861, and July 16, 1862, establishing a metropolitan police in the District of Columbia, to increase the efficiency thereof, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MEDICAL STATISTICS OF THE WAR.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a compendium of the medical statistics collected during the war in the offices of the Provost Marshal General and the Surgeon General.

INVESTIGATION OF COTTON FRAUDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas charges of fraud, peculation, and extortion have been made against agents of the cotton bureau by citizens, and especially cotton planters and cotton factors; and whereas said charges have also been made through the public press, and the serious attention of the Senate called thereto; and whereas it has been made to appear to the Senate that agents in some instances have been indicted by the State courts for swindling, and the jurisdiction of said courts in the premises having been denied, and the accused agents taken out of the hands of the civil authorities by military force:

Resolved, That a committee, to consist of—Senators, be, and the same is hereby, appointed to investigate the said charges, with authority to have brought before them persons and papers; and said committee will report the result of its investigation to the Senate for its action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution to-day. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUMNER. I think it had better lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw the objection, I desire to make an explanation in regard to this resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. But that will open the way to its consideration to-day. If the Senator thinks it advisable, however, to consider the resolution to-day, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his objection?

Mr. SUMNER. I do, at the request of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say that a similar resolution, or a resolution looking to the formation of a committee of inquiry and examination, was offered by the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NORRIS] some time ago, and was referred to the Committee on Finance; and perhaps I should not be going beyond my duty in stating that the Committee on Finance informed the honorable Senator who introduced the resolution, that whenever specific charges were made against any one connected with the Government, whether the Secretary of the Treasury, or any of his subordinates, an inquiry would at once be instituted into the conduct of the agent accused; but this general mode of arraigning a whole class of employes of the Government without any specific charges to me seems the grossest and most palpable injustice. I cannot say that I know the name of a single one of the cotton agents of the United States. I do not now recall the name of one of them; and yet they are constantly arraigned here by resolutions of the Senate en masse, without any allegation and without any specification. It seems to me that this is gross injustice.

If the Senator from Kentucky will state that he has information that any agent, naming him, has been guilty of any fraud upon the Government of the United States, there will be no difficulty whatever at any moment in having an examination, either by a special committee or by properly authorized agents of the Government. It seems to me this wholesale arraignment of officers of the Government is unjust to them and improper.

As a matter of course this resolution ought not to be adopted unless the Senator from Kentucky will make specific charges against one or more of these agents. If he does, there is not a Senator upon the floor but what will eagerly give him, if he desires it, an opportunity to examine into those charges. I merely make this remark now so that the persons who are accused by this general form of resolution shall not lie under the burden of accusation, and that the matter may be promptly disposed of whenever anybody is arraigned.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I will ask no other assurance than that the Senate will raise such a committee upon probable cause being made out.

Mr. SHERMAN. On specific charges being made.

Mr. DAVIS. I am informed from various sources that the instances of corruption in relation to cotton and the bringing out of cotton are very numerous, and that they are of the most flagitious character, and upon the largest scale. A friend of mine in Kentucky who was engaged in cotton operations was in the whole of the West and Southwest. He spoke from his own personal knowledge, as he said, and with a solitary exception, in the sweep of a thousand miles, he did not know a solitary agent, military or civil, of the Government that had been brought into contact with cotton that had not been corrupted by it. He told me that General Canby was the only solitary man in the sweep of a thousand miles that had been connected with cotton transactions who had not been corrupted by it, and he knew the fact. There are gentlemen in this city now that have given me information of the most extensive and flagitious corruptions of the agents connected with the sale and collection of cotton, these agents being in the service of the United States. If the honorable Senator from Ohio desires, as I do not doubt that he does desire, that light should be thrown in upon this subject, and if he will get his friends to agree to raise a committee to investigate cotton frauds, cotton swindling, and cotton speculations generally, upon a specification of the charges, I will promise to bring them in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say, in reply to the Senator from Kentucky, that whenever he or any other Senator makes specific charges against any agent of the Government employed in the purchase of cotton, and those charges are not immediately and promptly examined, or fairly dealt with by the Treasury Department, I will vote for a committee of this body at once to investigate them, and I believe that is the feeling here. Now, the Senator says that somebody, whom he does not name, tells him there is not an honest cotton agent in the United States, whether a military or civil officer. That is a very broad declaration, probably involving one or two thousand officers, because nearly all the officers in the southern States have had more or less to do with the operations of the Government in cotton. A charge of that kind, made so broad and sweeping, affecting the character of so many men, is a very peculiar one. I have heard the Secretary of the Treasury state that he has found the most clamor to be made against the most honest agents, and that sometimes, where a vigorous examination has been made into the alleged conduct of the agents, it was found that the only conduct complained of on the part of the agent was a faithful observance of the law and a strict discharge of his duty; and the more strictly an officer discharges his duty, the more clamorous will be the noise made about it. I say again, that if the Senator from Kentucky can arraign any officer of this Government for fraud and speculation connected with cotton transactions, he can have to-day and immediately a prompt and fair examination. Let him give the allegations and the names of the accused. It will first be the duty of the Treasury Department to examine into the conduct of the agent, and if they fail or neglect for a reasonable time to make that examination, there will be no difficulty in the Senator from Kentucky having the examination made here. Until that is done, it seems to me, these general allegations against a whole class of officers, including civil and military agents of the Government, ought not to be made.

Mr. DAVIS. If I am to be remitted to any Department of the Government I shall expect no success in this investigation. The way to reach it with certainty is by congressional investigation, and it is by the investigation being intrusted to the friends of the investigation. Let a committee be raised—as used to be the principle in relation to all committees—the majority of which are friendly to the object of the investigation. I will give one example of these frauds. There is a gentleman now in the service of the Treasury Department of the United States who is a cotton agent, and has been down the Mississippi and up the Red river engaged in purchasing cotton and bringing it out, and he told me that General Taylor, who is in the service in the Mississippi region of country, had lawlessly and fraudulently seized upon his cotton and had it appropriated out in such a manner as to reap himself a considerable portion of the avails of the sale of that cotton.

But I understand that the Senator from Ohio is receding from his position. All I want is for the Senator and the Senate to stand up to this position: let the Senate raise a fair committee to investigate any cases that may be specified, and let the friends of the investigation have the strength of the committee. It is certainly not a very fair way of investigating charges of fraud, or any other matter of maladministration, to place the investigation in the hands of men who wish to stifle it. If the honorable Senator and his friends, the majority in the Senate, will stand up to what I understood to be his position in the first instance—that when there are cases specified of fraud in cotton transactions they will raise a committee to investigate those transactions, and a fair committee—I will ask nothing more; and when such a committee reports in favor of the exoneration of men to whom these frauds have been imputed, I shall be among the first to retract those charges.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. The rule that I adopted when a member of the House of Representatives was this: when allegations of fraud were made against the officers of the Administration—then a Democratic Administration, and I thought a very bad one—I refused to have anything to do with them until specific charges were made, reduced to writing, and signed by responsible parties. Then I undertook to investigate the charges, and then a committee was appointed by a Democratic House of Representatives, of which I was chairman, and the majority of which was not friendly to the investigation; but the investigation was had, a fair investigation, and various matters were disclosed. Now, if the Senator from Kentucky desires to investigate these charges, if he says to us that he is satisfied that fraud has been committed in the cotton operations of the Government, I am perfectly willing to vote for a resolution to be introduced by him organizing a committee to investigate those charges, of which he will undoubtedly be the chairman; and if he can discover any fraud in the operations of the cotton agents of the Government, I shall be most happy to sustain him in punishing the officers engaged in that fraud.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman permit me to add one word?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The gentlemen from Kentucky and Ohio have addressed the Senate three times apiece on this matter, and I think I ought to have a turn by and by.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) Does the Senator from Maine yield the floor to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely remark to the honorable Senator from Ohio that, with his permission, I will embrace other matters besides cotton frauds in an auxiliary resolution. I know that in the State of Kentucky officers in the employment of the Government have extorted money from the people to the amount of thousands and tens of thousands, and indeed hundreds of thousands of dollars, in the name, and ostensibly for the benefit of the United States, and the mass of that money, I have reason to believe, has gone into the pockets of these officers, and not a dollar of it into the Treasury. I hope that the honorable Senator's disposition to investigate will allow me to bring in other subjects.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, in the perfect integrity and personal honor of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, I, with everybody else that knows him, have the most entire confidence; I have no doubt that he would discharge any duty imposed upon him with carefulness and ability and integrity; but at the same time I must say, that with regard to anything connected with this Government that he had to investigate and report upon, I am afraid he looks upon everything, no matter what, with so jaundiced an eye that it would be a little dangerous to intrust him with deciding upon anything that the Government or the Departments have done from the beginning to the end. Therefore I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio in saying that I should be very ready to commit the whole matter to the honorable Senator from Kentucky himself, and to a committee of his selection. I am very much afraid that, unintentionally, we might come to a wrong conclusion.

Having said this, I wish to remark further that I have had some experience with reference to these cotton transactions. The Senate will recollect that it became my duty, under a bill that was passed in the first session of the last Congress, to organize these cotton agencies. I did so to the best of my ability. I put them under the best men that I could find. Of all that applied, I was exceedingly careful, exceedingly minute in the examination of the character and capacity of the men selected and their general reputation and fitness for the places to which they were appointed. They had not been in office a month, had hardly entered upon their duties so far as to have it understood that they had entered upon their duties, before I had precisely this kind of complaint, rumors, charges coming in that the officers were doing this and doing that and cheating the public, and putting money into their own pocket, and statements of a similar description. I investigated them at once in many cases. I told the individuals that if I found any man who had in any way shown a disposition to make private profit more than he was entitled to by law and by the regulations under it, I would dismiss him at once from the public service, and I think I would have kept my word. In every instance in which I made an examination, or caused one to be made, I found that the charges were totally unfounded; that they emanated from men who had been disappointed in effecting their own purposes, who had not been able to do what they desired to do; that the law, under the direction of the agents, as applied to them, had not met their wishes; and at last I came to this conclusion, and stated it: that whenever any persons came to me to make a charge against a public officer, they must put it in writing, specify the instance, and put their names to it. I received anonymous letters, letters making these general charges, but, after the establishment of that rule, I found that although I had plenty of general talk, I could not get any man to put himself on paper with regard to them.

I have no doubt that there have been instances in which the Government agents have acted improperly, perhaps corruptly. It would be singular if, in the very large number of agents appointed, it was not so. You could hardly expect not to be deceived in some instances. But from the experience I had in the Treasury Department, so long as I staid in it, from what I saw and from what I learned, I became satisfied that, as a general rule, the business was conducted on the part of the agents of the Government with great integrity and with great care; and that, as a general rule—not, perhaps, in all cases—when complaints were made, they came either from interested speculators, men who had been cut off in their own efforts to cheat the Government, or men who were honestly misled by general rumors and statements that they picked up somewhere. When they came to me and made these statements, and I said to them, "Will you put yourself in writing and make the charge?" the reply always was, "Oh, no, I do not like to be known as meddling with it; I would rather my name would not be used." My answer was, "Sir, if you come here as an honest citizen of the Republic making a complaint, trying to expose corruption, why not take the responsibility of making the charge if you believe it?" "They did not like to be mixed up in it." I found that that was so in almost all cases; and I tell my friend from Kentucky that when he comes to the examination of the cases that have been stated to him, and asks his informant, whoever he may be, to put himself on paper, make the specific charge against the specific officer, my belief is he will entirely fail; he will tell the Senator he is not sufficiently aware of the facts to be able to state them on his own responsibility; that he got them from somebody else; that somebody else said so.

Now, sir, the Secretary of the Treasury has a very difficult task to perform. He is obliged to pick up this rebel cotton where he can, and I know from his own statements that he finds himself embarrassed in every direction in the manner in which it is going on now. I think a very great mistake was made in upsetting the system that was established at the time that I had the honor to be Secretary of the Treasury. The reason for it was, undoubtedly—and it seemed to be a good one—that the war had ceased and it was better to put an end to that system. I believe that it was the best system. It was the one pointed out by the statute, according to my reading of the statute. It was working well, and would have brought a great deal more money into the Treasury than any system that has been adopted since. However, the thing is done. It has led to embarrassment. Every man whose cotton is seized complains. I know of instances myself, if I may trust witnesses, where the most furious accusations are made against the cotton agents by the men who have had their own cotton seized, and who say that they are injured, and that this money has been taken for the benefit of the agent, and he is appropriating it for his benefit. Does the Senator from Kentucky think that, if a complaint is made to the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government is defrauded in an individual case, he will not investigate it and see if the Government is defrauded, and if so, whether the sum, whatever it is, cannot be secured and placed in the Treasury? I believe no man is more anxious, no man is more careful, no man is more ready to investigate and see that justice is done to the Government than the present Secretary of the Treasury. He labors in season and out of season to perform his very arduous and responsible duties—duties too great for any one man to perform in point of fact, as I happen to know by sad experience.

That being the case, I am opposed utterly to these fishing commissions before any attempt has been made to get an explanation from the proper quarter. The Senator says if he attempts to get justice from the Treasury Department he cannot obtain it. I repel the charge on the part of the Treasury Department. He can get it, or any other man can get it; and I will never vote for a commission to investigate the doings of the Treasury Department on the strength of a statement here by any Senator that he cannot get justice done at the Treasury Department. Let him prove that by specific facts stated to the Senate, and then we will see whether the Department itself wants investigation and not the inferior officers of the Department.

I am opposed in general to these appointments of committees of investigation on general statements and charges. They lead to great expense; they lead to great embarrassment; and they effect very little, in point of fact, one way or the other. But I agree with my friend from Ohio that when a case is presented, a specific charge made against an officer of the Government, with all the minuteness which will amount to a reasonable certainty, for I require no more, on the strength of the names of witnesses who are credible, and who make the charge, and whom we should know and hold responsible for them, then I am ready to have an investigation by a committee; but for us to appoint a committee of investigation on the strength of a mere resolution, founded, in its very terms, on newspaper rumors in part, and general statements of we know not whom, applying to nobody but covering the ground all over in this way, is a mere idle waste of time and of money, and a thing that we ought never to do. There is no end of it. It is departing from our proper duties to meddle with things that do not belong to us until it is satisfactorily shown to us that an examination on the part of Congress, one body or the other, is absolutely essential.

I hope, therefore, that we will take the ground in regard to this resolution, and with regard to all others of the kind, that we will not appoint these committees of Congress to make special examinations until we have something definite and fixed upon which to found it. That—as my friend from Ohio has stated; I may as well state it after him—was the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Finance on examining the resolution that was sent to us by the honorable Senator from Minnesota, and to that I feel disposed to adhere.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. McDUGALL addressed the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Chair will recognize the Senator from California on the left of the Chair, [Mr. CONNESS.]

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 135) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes, which was pending yesterday when the morning hour expired.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator from California will withdraw his motion, I will not detain the Senate more than a moment, and will then consent to it.

Mr. CONNESS. The morning hour has nearly expired, and the bill to which I refer is of great consequence. I hope we will be able to get to its consideration. However, I will give way to the Senator if he will only occupy a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I was merely going to say—Mr. McDUGALL. I believe I am next entitled to the floor, if my colleague waives it to anybody. I addressed the Chair when he did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will feel bound to accord the floor to the Senator from California, if he claims it, the Senator from Kentucky having spoken twice in the same debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to any gentleman occupying the floor who wishes it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish simply, if my colleague permits me to have the floor, to move an amendment to the resolution. It is to insert after the word "charges" the words, "and also all frauds on the part of Government officers where the matter may be inquired of at the port of New Orleans and in the States of Mississippi and Arkansas."

Mr. President, I am not much in favor of these police committees. I am inclined to think that it is somewhat inconsistent with the dignity of the Senate to be engaged in this kind of espial to find out things; but, nevertheless, it has been made the order of the day. Whenever a committee was asked from the opposite side of the Chamber, with a traveling commission, to inquire into anything concerning the war, it was always granted, and their expenses paid to go from here to St. Louis, from there to Louisville, and from there to New Orleans—a traveling legislative committee to go and inquire into things. The Senator from Maine now thinks that that is not a legitimate system of inquiry. I think with him in truth that it is not a legitimate system of inquiry. I think it would be very difficult to entice me to go off and play detective East, West, North, or South; but it has been done. Even this great committee that you have had here, the committee on the conduct of the war, was a detective committee. They wanted to know how a man would swear before he could be introduced there; at least some did.

It is the business of the majority here to affirm; it is the right of the minority to object, and, if necessary, to protest. We, the minority, questioning the exercise of administration by what we call an infirm majority, come in here and question the conduct of their administration through all their offices. Can we not question? Will you confine the business of questioning to yourselves, the majority; or will you permit us, who have to watch you—that is our business now as a minority—to question you? No, says the Senator from Maine, we will not permit you to watch us.

Now, there is no man on this Senate floor who does not morally know—I will not say mathematically—that there have been immense frauds in the cotton business. There is not a man who knows anything about the valley of the Mississippi that does not know that men who went in there poverty-stricken came out millionaires; or at least millionaires in francs. Undertake to say that a man who was rejected in this Senate Hall for a commission in the quartermaster's department, who was not worth $10,000, who was a common gambler in my own State, and followed that business, went down to New Orleans, and it happened to be his multiple luck to have a general of the Federal Army who was a brother of his. Gentlemen ask for a statement of facts. What I state I do not doubt, for I heard it from a witness to a will—the climax of it at least. After being rejected by this Senate, he went down to New Orleans. He lay down at the Balize and controlled the entire commerce of the port of New Orleans while his brother commanded the forces at the city of New Orleans. He came back, and I suppose, by the providence of God, he died in the city of New York, and made his will there, and it is in the surrogate's office. He left $2,000,000 to be divided between his heirs and his brother. No person will have any difficulty in ascertaining who I intend to remark about when I say these things. I believe that almost all Senators are acquainted with the name of Benjamin F. Butler. I dare say all I am informed about and all I think, and it shall not be laid to my door by the Senator from Maine, or any one else, that we do not challenge facts. I am satisfied that one of our principal general officers made $1,000,000 in cotton down on the Mississippi while he was commanding our forces there. That it was a common business on the part of the officer I know. That it should be inquired into is due to justice and truth; and if the majority will not allow the minority to inquire into it, then the majority cannot be long predominant.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to lay this resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I have not had the benefit of the experience of the honorable Senator from Maine in relation to the financial transactions of the affairs of the Government. He thinks that I would be too prone to inculpate these officers to be intrusted upon the committee. I do not believe that I would be more prone to inculpate them than he would be to exculpate them.

Now, sir, I know of my own knowledge many officers who have gone into their respective offices poor and penniless, and they have grown suddenly rich upon moderate salaries. I have known officers whose salaries were about three thousand dollars a year to sport their carriages and fine horses, to buy town lots, to erect costly buildings upon them, and to indulge in a great deal of extravagance in living. I cannot understand how this can come about unless it is by peculation and plunder and swindling.

The honorable Senator says that I am suspicious of the acts of this Administration and of its officers who are in office. I confess the impeachment. I have an extensive and a deep conviction that in a great many of the money transactions of this Government there is the largest amount of plunder and of swindling. I do not doubt it. I suppose the honorable Senator from Maine will not dictate who shall go upon this committee, or whether a committee shall be raised or not. I presume it is not his office to decide the one question or the other. I feel myself as competent on the score of ability to do justice to any man inculpated as that honorable Senator does, or any other member of the Senate. I know this: that if a man has a charge made against him and the evidence brought forward to sustain that charge is not sufficient, I should be as prompt and ready to exculpate him from the charge as any Senator whatever.

But I do not ask, I do not desire, I would prefer if a committee should be raised, not to be upon it. All that I ask is, that a fair committee, an independent and intelligent committee, that would have the industry and the courage to ferret out the truth in relation to all charges brought before them, shall be raised. I have no doubt if such a committee was raised, and it industriously and patiently performed its duties, and was allowed sufficient time and sufficient facilities, it could bring to the Treasury millions and millions of money that has been plundered by faithless agents and which ought to be paid by them into the Treasury. I have no doubt that a large spoil of that description could be gathered up in the State of Kentucky, and in the South, in the whole cotton region, where cotton has been the subject of traffic and of trade by officers, civil and military, of the Government. I have no doubt that such a committee as I have indicated, if raised and allowed to explore patiently and thoroughly, in a spirit of truth and justice, all the charges of plunder and peculation, it would result in millions upon millions to the public Treasury, the honorable Senator's experience and protest to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not believe in the fruits or the utility of men who are interested in stifling the truth and in covering up an investigation of these charges being allowed the sole and exclusive privilege of investigating them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is House resolution No. 51, upon which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to be understood on this subject. I do not approve of this resolution. Probably my objection to the resolution may have been sufficiently stated. I do not believe in Senators or Representatives belonging to a police commission. I would not vote for the resolution under any circumstances, because I am opposed to it upon principle. I think that the office of a Senator is something above a police officer. That is all I desire to say.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON to the amendment proposed by Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in the remarks which I am about to make I shall address myself, first, to the consideration of the resolution immediately before the Senate in order to ascertain its exact meaning; secondly, the supposed necessity which calls for such an amendment; and thirdly, its effect upon the condition of the country. In this, as in every other case upon which human judgment is to be exercised, it is very important that we should distinctly understand what the measure under consideration is. The honorable chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, has, if I understood him correctly, done nothing more than state the difference between the resolution as it was originally reported by the committee, and as upon a recommitment it was subsequently amended. It is the amendment which was made upon that recommitment that is now before the Senate.

What, then, is the meaning of the resolution as it now stands? The second section of the first article of the Constitution regulates the mode in which representation and taxation are to be ascertained, and it makes both to depend upon the same facts. Representation is to be apportioned according to numbers. Direct taxation is to be apportioned in the same way. As the resolution was originally reported the committee left them, subject only to other changes, to stand in the same condition. Upon the recommitment, the provision originally contained in relation to direct taxation was omitted, and it stands now as a proposition to amend the Constitution so as to affect alone the second section of the first article of the Constitution as it now is, which provides the mode in which the number of Representatives is to be ascertained.

The Senate will remember that that was made to depend exclusively upon numbers, with two exceptions. The first of the exceptions was, that in ascertaining the numbers which were to regulate the amount of representation, Indians not taxed were to be excluded. The other was, that that portion of the people of the States in which the institution existed, which was held in a condition of slavery, was not to be taken into the estimate to their entire extent, but only to the extent of three fifths of the whole; so that, as the Constitution now stands, if slavery still existed, the southern States would be entitled to a number of Representatives to be ascertained by ascertaining the number of persons within each State generally, and secondly, by debiting the State as against such number with the entire Indian race who were not subject to taxation, and two fifths of the persons in such States who were not to be taken into the estimate.

Under that mode of ascertaining the representation to which these southern States were entitled, the country, from the time of the adoption of the Constitution up to the present moment, excepting only the four years through which we have so sadly but triumphantly passed, prospered wonderfully. Perhaps I am not going too far in saying that in the history of the world no people organized under any form of government ever prospered as much during the same period, or ever have prospered as much during the entire period of their existence, as the people of the United States have prospered since 1789, under this particular provision.

That being the case, Mr. President, let me for a moment call the attention of the Senate to the effect of the proposed amendment. The entire amendment, except the proviso, makes no change at all in the corresponding provision in the Constitution, except that it omits the provision that three fifths only of a certain class of the population is to be considered. The reason for that omission is of course apparent. There are no such persons now in existence in any of the States of the Union who are not entitled to be considered each for himself as a man, and not as property. The provision in relation to the estimation of three fifths instead of the whole number was made because there did at that time exist in the States a class of persons who held the double capacity of man and property, or, to speak more correctly, who were persons and chattels. There was great difficulty in the Convention in providing for the manner in which, as far as that class of persons was concerned, representation was to be ascertained, and an equal difficulty in ascertaining, as far as they were concerned, how the provision as to taxation was to be made, and they came (for in those days there was no such objection as seems now to be inseparable in the minds of some Senators to compromising) to the conclusion that the good of the country demanded that there should be a compromise, and they proposed, as a compromise, the provision as it now stands; and that is, that for the purposes of representation, a person held in slavery or in involuntary servitude shall be esteemed three fifths a man and two fifths property; and they established the same rule in relation to taxation. They very wisely concluded that, as it was all-important that some general rule should be adopted, this was the best rule, because promising more than any other rule to arrive at a just result of ascertaining the number of Representatives and ascertaining the quota of taxation.

Now, as far as relates to the quota of taxation, or as far as relates to the quota of representation, the state of things is materially changed. There are no men, so to speak, who are but three fifths men. We all stand upon the same platform. As we came from nature's God, we stand together upon an equality as far as relates to human rights, and it was entirely unnecessary, therefore, to change the mode of apportioning representation or of apportioning taxation except for some other purpose which did not enter into the estimation of the wise and good men by whom the Constitution was adopted in recommending this particular provision. This amendment says to the States, "You are to be entitled to a number of Representatives in proportion to your numbers"—which is all right; that our fathers designed; that they gave; and under that, the country has gone on prosperously—"but if you, in the exercise of your right, think proper to exclude from the privilege of suffrage any portion of the numbers of your population on account of race or color, that portion is to be taken from the amount of numbers which is to regulate the number of your Representatives; your power in the Government is correspondingly to be decreased." It does more than that. It not only says that if there be, by State legislation, a distinction on account of race or color in the exercise of the elective franchise, not only shall the number of persons who shall be so excluded from the franchise be deducted from the number of persons which is to ascertain the number of your Representatives, but every man, whether entitled to vote or not by the laws of the State, of whom it may be said that he belongs to a race, and every man who comes under the denomination of color within the limits of the States, is to be deducted from the enumeration. If, therefore, as is done by the State of New York, and by several States of the Union, a distinction is made between the right to vote on the part of the colored man and the right to vote on the part of the white man in any way by requiring for the one a qualification not required for the other, the whole of that population in the State of New York is to be deducted from the enumeration. Under the constitution and laws of New York, if I am not misinformed, no person of color can vote in that State who has not a freehold and an acquired residence. The possession of a freehold estate by the white voter of New York is not required, and there is, therefore, in that State, at this moment, a distinction between the white and the colored race in the exercise of the right of franchise; and this resolution says that if there be any such distinction, then not only are the number of persons of that race who may be entitled to vote because they are freeholders to be deducted from the whole number of persons in the State, but the entire number of the race are to be deducted, and New York loses, or may lose, a portion of her representation.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the honorable Senator at this point allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CONNESS. Suppose one of these States, the State of North Carolina for instance, if this amendment should be adopted, should enact that a property qualification should be required for the exercise of the franchise, not applicable to the colored people alone, but applicable to all alike, and such an amount was established as would lead to the exclusion of a large number of the colored population necessarily from the polls, would not that State, notwithstanding this amendment, be entitled to representation for its entire population, black and white, inasmuch as the exclusion was not on account of race or color, but a property qualification applying universally? I ask the Senator for information.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unquestionably; and I have said nothing that could be construed as denying that proposition. None are to be deducted from the number which is to regulate the representation except the entire class against whom some qualification is required for the exercise of the right of franchise that is not required of the white race. If the same qualification is required for both, of course there is no distinction; and the honorable member's question therefore is answered, as I think he will see by looking at the terms of the resolution. What I said was, that as the franchise is now regulated in New York, unless she changes it, either by abolishing the freehold qualification now demanded, or by requiring a like qualification upon the part of the white voter, the whole of the colored population of New York will be deducted in the estimate.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the honorable Senator allow me one instant?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that I did not propound the interrogatory with a view of questioning the correctness of what the Senator had stated; but at this point I desired a discussion by him of the effect of such a statute in one of these States under this amendment; and with that view, I put the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to the interrogatory at all, and I admit in answer to the interrogatory, that in the case supposed by the honorable gentleman there would be no deduction, they would all be embraced; but if other States as well as New York admitting the colored man to vote at all, require a qualification which they do not exact of the white man, then the entire colored men within the limits of the State are to be deducted from the estimate.

But, Mr. President, there is another question, which the Senate will have to meet and the country will have to meet if this amendment is adopted. How many States in the Union now admit the colored man to the exercise of the right of suffrage? Only six. In every State except Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, there is a distinction in regard to suffrage on the ground of color. In Massachusetts, only males of twenty-one years of age who can read the Constitution in the English language or write their names, can vote. I ask not how many States admit them to the exercise of the right of franchise by requiring of them a different qualification from that which they require of the white voter, but how many of them positively exclude them from the exercise of the right of franchise? We have thirty-six States in the Union, supposing the southern States not to be out. Eleven are supposed to be out. Now admit, for the sake of the argument, that they are to be esteemed as out, how many of those who are claimed to be in and who are admitted to be in, whose representatives are on this floor, give to the colored man the right of franchise? Only six; and unless the States change their policy—and I am by no means persuaded they will; on the contrary, as far as I have an opinion on the subject, I believe they will not, and that opinion is formed upon the occurrences of the time—if this amendment passes, there is hardly one of those States that would not lose a Representative, or more than one, provided they had this population among them. They may be willing—I do not speak of the Senators on this floor—to adopt an amendment of this kind, because it will not operate upon them, because it will not diminish their power. They may be willing to adopt it because it will operate upon and will diminish the power of the States in which the race is to be found.

Let me see. Four or five States are sufficient for the illustration of the proposition which I have just stated. I take from the census of 1860 the figures I am about to present. Massachusetts has a white population of 1,221,961, and a colored population of only 9,602. New York has a white population of 3,831,730, and a colored population of 49,005; Vermont a white population of 319,889, and a colored population of 709. The State of New Hampshire, which my friend before me [Mr. CLARK] represents with so much ability and so much zeal and so much usefulness to his State—he is in favor of this amendment in some form or other—has a white population of 325,579 and a colored population of 424.

The experiment is quite a safe one for them. They will not be affected by it injuriously. They will lose no Representative, but on the contrary they gain, not in the number of Representatives perhaps, but they gain in the relative influence of the Representatives that they will have on the floor. They will be met, not by the corresponding Representatives of the other States in numbers, such as the Constitution of 1789 designed those other States should have, but they will be met by Representatives less by one third than those that our fathers thought should be the number of Representatives of those States. The chairs in the other Hall that are placed there for the purpose of accommodating the Representatives of the southern States will be more or less vacated, and what for? Is it from the danger of having them filled? Are not the North and the statesmen of the North equal to the South and the statesmen of the South on all subjects that may come before the councils of the nation? What is there, looking to the history of the two sections in the past, which would lead us to believe that the North is inferior to the South in anything of intellectual improvement or of statesmanship? You have proved, and I thank God you have proved, that if listening to evil counsels, rendered effective perhaps by your own misjudged legislation, and by the ill-advised course of your own population, exhibited through the press and the pulpit, a portion of the South involved the country in a war, the magnitude of which no language can describe—you have proved yourselves adequate to the duty of defeating them in their mad and, as far as the letter of the Constitution is concerned, their traitorous purpose. And now, having proved your physical manhood, do you doubt your intellectual manhood? Mr. President, in the presence in which I speak, I am restrained from speaking comparatively of the Senate as it is and the Senate as it has been; but I can say this with as much sincerity as man ever spoke, that there is nothing to be found in the free States calculated to disparage them properly in the estimation of the wise and the good. They are able to conduct the Government, and they will not be the less able because they have the advice and the counsels of their southern brethren.

And yet, applying for illustration to the population of my own State, you will see how the proposed amendment will operate upon her. She has a white population of 515,918 and a colored population of 171,131, about one fourth of the entire number within her territorial limits; and if she refuses to let any one black man vote in point of fact, or refuses it by requiring a qualification which she does not require from any white man, the whole of the 171,000 are to be deducted from the estimate. Is that just? The honorable member from Massachusetts thinks it is; and why? Because the declaration of rights proclaims all men equal and entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The honorable member says that not to give all men the privilege of voting is to leave Maryland an oligarchy, an aristocracy, a monopoly, a caste. I say we have been under a very extraordinary delusion from 1776 to the present time. We have believed, and the country has believed with us, that the government of Maryland was of a republican form. It never entered into the imagination of the great men who framed her constitution of 1775, nor of their great contemporaries who constituted the Convention of 1789, that there was anything in the constitution of that State which gave anybody a right to characterize it as an oligarchy, an aristocracy, a monopoly, a caste. The honorable member from Massachusetts is the inventor of that proposition.

But if it be right, I ask the Senate why they do not seek to attain the right directly. Why endeavor to do it indirectly? If the existing constitution of Maryland—I instance Maryland only for the purpose of illustration—is not republican, and cannot be republican unless all the colored people within her limits are entitled to vote precisely as the white men within her limits are entitled to vote, tell her so; change your Constitution and make it our duty by your paramount law to place them on the same footing. But to do that, you must place your own States in the same condition. Then Maine is to be deprived of the right of regulating the suffrage in her State; New York is to be deprived of it; and so of all the other States. If it be right, if no government where a provision of that sort is not incorporated as one of its fundamental laws is republican in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, then it is consequently right that we should make it republican by constitutional enactment. Why do you not do it? I will not say because you know it cannot be done; but the fact is you ought to know that it cannot be accomplished, right or wrong. It is an evil, if it be one, without remedy. The States will not adopt it. They will stand upon the Constitution their fathers gave them. They will claim for themselves, and in my judgment even to the point of revolution, and I say it in no threatening sense, because such a proposition is not before us, but if it was they would claim even to the point of revolution that they should have a right to regulate suffrage within their own limits.

That brings me to consider whether they have not that right. The honorable member from Massachusetts has gravely told us in a speech elaborate in its preparation and full of the learning which ever characterizes the performances of the honorable member, that they have no right now, except only so long as Congress shall forbear to exercise its own power of regulating the right of suffrage. He derives the power so to regulate State suffrage from the declaration of rights; from the necessity growing out of the war; from that clause of the Constitution which guaranties to each State a republican form of government; and, finally, from the second clause of the recent amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery. I will take these four up in their order, for the purpose of showing to the Senate that neither of them has the slightest application—I speak it with all respect to the honorable member—to the proposition for which he referred to them.

The question is, what did our fathers design? Where was the regulation of suffrage to be left? Until modern time—and I mean by modern time the last three or four years—no man was so wild as to imagine that the suffrage was not exclusively for State jurisdiction. The Constitution went into operation in 1789; and during the long period that elapsed from that time to the breaking out of this rebellion, no man anywhere suggested that it was in the power of Congress to interfere with the right of suffrage in the States; and it could not be otherwise, the Constitution from its very nature being a grant of specific powers, and nothing else. The principle is stated, with that rare felicity which characterized everything that came from his pen, by Chancellor Kent, in the first volume of his Commentaries in these words:

"The Constitution of the United States is an instrument containing the grant of specific powers, and the Government of the Union cannot claim any powers but what are contained in the grant, and given either expressly or by necessary implication. The powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions or remaining with the people of the several States prior to the establishment of the Constitution of the United States, continue unaltered and unimpaired except so far as they are granted to the United States."

I suppose that even the honorable member from Massachusetts will not deny that it was for Massachusetts to regulate her suffrage before 1789; and if it was, she has the power still, unless she has agreed to part with it by devolving it upon the General Government. Is there a word in the Constitution that intimates such a purpose? The second section of the first article deals exclusively with the manner in which the members to compose the House of Representatives of the United States are to be selected. It says in the first part of the clause nothing at all as to the right of suffrage. It provides, "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." If it had stopped there, it might perhaps be contended that it would have been in the power of the Congress of the United States to regulate the manner in which the people of the States were to choose Representatives; but the trouble is that it goes on to say who are to be the electors of the Representatives that are to compose in point of numbers the House; and it says, "and the electors in each State," that is to say the voters in each State, for "electors" as used here, is synonymous with "voters"—

"And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

Who at that time was clothed with the power of prescribing the qualification of electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature? The State; nobody else. The provision therefore means and is to be read in this way: the House shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people, and the electors in each State shall be entitled to vote in the choice of such Representatives if they have the qualifications prescribed by their own constitution and laws for choosing the most numerous branch of their own State Legislature. Except in that clause, and another clause to which I shall refer presently, there is nothing in the instrument that says anything about the election of Representatives.

The honorable member has quoted Mr. Madison. He supposes that Mr. Madison was of the opinion that the right of suffrage might be controlled by Congress. He referred to the fifty-fourth number of the Federalist, and I think the honorable member attributed that paper to Mr. Hamilton. About that, as I am sure he is aware, there are more than serious doubts. It was given to Mr. Jay by Mr. Hamilton; but it was uniformly claimed by Mr. Madison. The edition which I hold in my hand was prepared as far as that particular question was concerned under the advice and inspection of Mr. Madison; and in it he takes to himself the authorship of number fifty-four; and I rather think, from a frequent and careful examination of these papers as written by the three eminent men to whom the country is so much indebted for their production, that the style is more the style of Madison than of Hamilton. It is more precise, and I was about to say more perspicuous because it is more precise. Hamilton was more in the habit of adorning his papers than Madison.

Now, what does Mr. Madison, or whoever is the author of number fifty-four, say? If the honorable member from Massachusetts will listen for a moment, I think he will see that he took it for granted that the States alone could regulate the franchise. The number is that which deals with the ratio of representation. I will read from it a sentence or two:

"It is not contended that the number of people in each State ought not to be the standard for regulating the proportion of those who are to represent the people of each State. The establishment of the same rule for the apportionment of taxes will probably be as little contested."

Then he goes on to state that, under all the circumstances, there is no better way of ascertaining the proportion of taxes which the several States should be made to pay than adopting the same standard by which the basis of representation was arrived at. The South was dissatisfied with one portion of the provision, and the North was dissatisfied with another portion. The South insisted that if their negroes were to be considered as persons at all the whole number should be counted. The North insisted that if they were to be considered as property no portion should be counted. Mr. Madison, after stating the objection to the clause made by each party, says that it is a fundamental principle of the proposed Constitution that the aggregate number of Representatives was to be determined by a Federal rule founded on the aggregate number of the inhabitants. He goes on to state, as another fundamental rule, that the right of choosing that number shall be left to the States. I shall make myself better understood by citing his language:

"It is a fundamental principle of the proposed Constitution that, as the aggregate number of Representatives allotted to the several States is to be determined by a Federal rule, founded on the aggregate number of inhabitants, so the right of choosing this allotted number in each State is to be exercised by such part of the inhabitants as the State itself may designate."

Words could not have been adopted more obviously leading to the conclusion that in the opinion of the writers of the Federalist, the States were to have the sole right of regulating the suffrage; otherwise what a contradiction would be the result. The honorable member from Massachusetts says we have a right to regulate the suffrage in the States, because we have the right to regulate the number of Representatives in the other House. How are we to regulate the suffrage in the choice of members of Congress? It is not proposed to rescind that part of the provision which says that they are to be chosen by the electors who choose the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That is to be left; that you do not propose to disturb; and if you do not propose to disturb it, what you would be compelled to do in order to accomplish your object is to have one mode of electing Representatives to Congress and another mode of electing members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. But nobody dreams of interfering with the right of the States to regulate suffrage with reference to their own officers, or of interfering with the right of the States to appoint their own officers; or to elect their own officers, and to prescribe the qualifications which the electors of their own officers are to have. Nobody has ever dreamed that this Government was to step within the limits of State lines and tell the States how their Legislatures shall be elected, how their officers shall be chosen. If the honorable member is right in the theory for which he contends, it would follow that we should have one mode for the exercise of the right of suffrage in electing Representatives, and another mode, if the States thought proper to adopt another mode, for electing members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and yet the Constitution in its very terms prescribes that the mode of electing shall be the same. If you have no right—and that I assume in what I am now about to say—to interfere with the elective franchise by prescribing the qualifications of voters in the several States, is it right, is it just, is it fair that you should attempt to do it indirectly?

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senator passes from that part of his argument, if he will allow me, I wish to call his attention to a point on which I should like very much to have his opinion. The Senator is aware that last Friday we passed an act containing this provision:

That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power (excluding Indians not taxed) are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color; and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery.

Now, as I understand it, this act, which, as the Senator will see, actually annuls all State laws everywhere throughout the United States fixing any inequality in civil rights so far as it has constitutional sanction—and I do not doubt that it has constitutional sanction—is founded upon the second clause of the recent amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery. Now, the point to which I ask the attention of the Senator before he passes from this branch of the discussion—I shall value very much his conclusion upon it—is whether, if we can annul all State laws declaring inequality in civil rights, we cannot also annul all State laws declaring inequality in political rights; whether if this act is constitutional, as I believe it is, such an act as I propose would not also be constitutional. And in that connection I would call the attention of the Senator to the famous judgment of Chief Justice Marshall (which he remembers so well) in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, where the Chief Justice distinctly declared, having the point before him, that it was within the power of Congress to select its means, provided the means were appropriate to the end; it was not for the Supreme Court, or any other branch of the Government, to sit in judgment on the means that Congress chose to select. Therefore, if Congress shall now think that in order to enforce the abolition of slavery it is necessary, in the first place, to annul all inequality of civil rights, and in the second place to annul all inequality of political rights, I ask the Senator whether a proposition founded on the latter branch of the postulate can be called in question; whether an act of Congress annulling all State laws declaring any inequality of political rights is not absolutely constitutional.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was my purpose, Mr. President, before ceasing to trouble the Senate, to allude to the proposition to which the honorable member has just called my special attention; but I can dispose of it now in a word or two.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will pardon me; but I thought he was passing from that branch of the question; otherwise I should not have interrupted him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps it was more connected with this branch of my argument than any other, but it was not the branch of it in which I had proposed to refer to that proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I beg the Senator's pardon, and I hope he will go on with his argument without reference to my interruption.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is nothing to ask pardon for. I am obliged to the honorable member for interrupting me at any time. I was about to say, before coming regularly to the consideration of the subject to which the honorable member draws my attention, that he will of course recollect that I have stated more than once that the bill upon which he now relies is unconstitutional. As far as it is an authority, with me it has no weight whatever except that weight which belongs to the respect I habitually pay to the opinions of the Senate when they happen to differ from my own. But even supposing it to be within the power of Congress to pass a law of that kind, it by no means follows that I think it has power to pass a law placing all the inhabitants of the States on the same political ground.

When the honorable member from Massachusetts interrupted me for a purpose of which of course I do not complain, I was asking whether it was right or proper to do this thing in the way proposed. The joint committee reported an amendment to the Constitution; and I think perhaps none of them is of the opinion that it can be done in any other way than by a change of the Constitution; certainly that is my own opinion. If it be right that such a change should be effected by a constitutional provision, is it not proper that it should be accomplished in that way, instead of accomplishing it indirectly? Why is it that we are afraid to trust the people? Are Senators on that side of the Chamber afraid to trust the people of their respective States with the decision of this question; and if they are apprehensive, what is the ground of their apprehension? That they believe it would not be sanctioned. They have reason to believe that they have the numbers now which will enable them to adopt this amendment, and that the consequence of this amendment will be to effect what they desire in the southern States without its producing the slightest effect in the northern States.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that the time had passed when we were to esteem ourselves as different peoples. Our fathers esteemed us as one. The Constitution deals with us as one. As one the Government from its organization has been conducted. All of our triumphs in the field and in the council, upon the land and upon the ocean, have been won by us as one. And I ask if it is not a mischievous proposition that Senators are unwilling to leave a change of the Constitution, which they propose to accomplish indirectly, to the people of the several States? Can it be for any other reason than that it would not be adopted? Would Connecticut adopt it? Recently she voted against that change in her own State by casting a majority of two thousand nine hundred and six against it. Would Minnesota adopt it? She voted against it by a majority of eight thousand six hundred and eighty-five. Would Wisconsin adopt it? Her vote against it was a majority of seventeen thousand five hundred and thirty-nine. Do you think they will change their opinion? Do you not know that they have not changed? And yet so far as the result is concerned upon the influence of the representation of those States in the councils of the nation, it would be as nothing compared with the result which it would have upon the State of Maryland and other southern States.

How, then, do you propose to accomplish it? You say to States situated like mine, "We will reduce your representation if you do not let your negroes vote. We will not permit ours to vote, and you cannot present to us an inducement which will lead us to let ours vote; we have considered that question already, and we have decided it by a judgment which we have no idea of reversing; but we will put it to you in such a shape that unless you agree to it, the number of your representatives in the halls of Congress will be very sensibly diminished." Would you, gentlemen, do you think you would—I do not ask you to say now at once, any of you, but when you come coolly to reflect upon the operation of a provision of this description—would either of you agree to vote for it if the influence of it on your States was to be the same as it will be upon some of the southern States? Would you do it if we changed places? If in the dispensation of Providence the three million negroes were to find a home within the northern States and separated equally as among all the northern States, is there any man within the hearing of my voice who will coolly reflect upon the subject, who will not come to the conclusion that no representative from a northern State would venture to support a proposition which would diminish the representation of his State, and relatively increase the representation of the sister States? I apprehend not. It is because the proposed measure does not affect you as it affects us, that you may safely vote for it. It is because, whether it be adopted or not, your power and your influence in the Government remain the same, it having no operation upon you, but operating and designed to operate exclusively upon us.

Nobody has a higher esteem than myself for the members of the committee reporting this measure, whom I have the pleasure personally to know. I know that they are governed by what they believe to be pure motives. They think the denial of the right of suffrage to the blacks of the southern States is calculated to injure the whole country. They have brought themselves to believe that the possession of the right of suffrage by the blacks will promote the safety and quiet of the country. In my opinion it is a sad mistake. It is a sad mistake for both. It is a mistake in reference to the blacks to be found within the southern limits, and with reference to the whites. It is a still greater mistake, if possible, to the people of the other States. We have come out of this war with an immense debt, to meet which will require all the energies of the Government. There is not a foot of land that we should not have cultivated in order to enable us to meet our engagements. The peculiar productions of the South above all should be promoted. You think, perhaps, there is nothing in this measure which will interfere with either. I think you are sadly mistaken. Leave the blacks as they are, protected by the Constitution of the United States in every right which belongs to a freeman, entitled to claim the benefit of all the guarantees of personal liberty and protection to be found in the Constitution of the United States, as much as the white man. Leave him to work for his living, as the white man works for his living. Leave him free to contract, as he is. Leave him under the protection of laws that will enable him to enforce his contracts, as he is. Leave him to educate himself, as far as nature will permit, until he can raise himself to the elevation of the white race, as I think he may; and then, if possible, change your organic law; then, if possible, forget that nature has made the distinction.

The God of the white man and the God of the black man—I speak it with due reverence—is the Being who first made a distinction on account of color. Why was the negro created black? It is beyond the ken of man to ascertain. Why were we created white? Is not the mere difference in color sufficient to warn us that Heaven designed a difference? And have not some of you acted on the fact that there is such a difference? Why is that separate places for the respective races even in your own Chamber? Why are they not put together? There is not a man within the sound of my voice—certainly I am not one—who has any feeling against the black race. There is nothing in the world that I am capable of doing that I would not do to elevate them. In a professional life of now more than fifty years' duration, I never failed to give them the benefit of my advice and services. But I feel with an instinct that nature has planted within us, and they perhaps feel it as strongly as we do, that nature has created the distinction, and there it must remain as long as white is white and black is black.

But by this amendment you not only seek to reduce (by appealing to our supposed love of power) the number of Representatives to which we are entitled, and forcing us thereby to yield our convictions, but you increase the amount of our taxation. The Constitution said that the mode of ascertaining taxation shall be the same as the mode of ascertaining representation. That mode was to deduct two fifths from that portion of the population which was held in a state of servitude. You have done away with that provision. You therefore now say that unless we agree to let every black man vote who possesses the qualification of age the whole number of the race is to be deducted in the basis of representation; but when we come to the question what proportion of taxes we are to pay, the whole number, instead of three fifths, is to be counted, so that the operation of the amendment is to diminish representation and increase taxation. Is that right? I think, and I have suggested it in another place, that the true rule would be to apportion representation according to voters, and taxation according to wealth. That is fair; that operates alike everywhere.

What does California do? What does Oregon do? What does Nevada do? They exclude the Chinese altogether; and yet they are counted in the basis of representation. They form a part of the basis upon which those States claim to be represented in Congress. But we, instead of having Chinamen whom we will not permit to vote, have colored men; and because they are colored we lose representation while you retain it, because your Chinamen are not "colored" in the sense in which the term "colored" is used. Now, I ask Nevada and Oregon if it is correct to claim for themselves one rule and to exact as against us another.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to suggest that under this amendment I do not think Chinamen can be counted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly they will be counted in the whole number.

Mr. STEWART. But not in the basis of representation under this amendment. I think the same rule would operate on Chinese as on negroes, for they are "colored." The provision of the amendment is in reference to exclusions on account of race or color.

Mr. JOHNSON. You are very much mistaken. Your State will be the first to say, "We are entitled to just as many Representatives after this amendment passes as before." If you think your people will be satisfied with losing any part of their representation, I submit it to you, perhaps you had better reconsider before you give this vote, because you may lose, and will lose.

Mr. STEWART. I think the Pacific coast would lose representation under this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. You would either lose or you would not lose. If you would not lose, it is because you would not fall within the proviso; and it is unjust for you to apply to us a provision which you are not willing to apply to yourselves. If you do lose because you fall within the proviso, then look to it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I like to hear the Senator from Maryland argue a question, and he has argued this question on the basis of fairness. When we propose to change the organic law, of course what has been the organic law cannot be used as an argument why it should be continued as such. I ask the Senator now to consider for a moment a question of fairness. Iowa, which I in part represent, has about the same population as Maryland; our people are nearly all white people, whereas one third or one fourth of those of Maryland are colored people. Now, in fairness, if the colored men in Maryland cannot vote, if they are unfit to vote, why should they be counted in the representation against an equal number of white men in Iowa who can vote? In other words, in fairness, why should two Marylanders count equal to three Iowans?

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member tell me why it is fair that Iowa should be represented in part because of her female population?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Maryland is; and it is equal.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; but why is it that you are entitled to be represented because of your female population? It is not because you consider them competent to vote, for you do not let them vote.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I did not know that the Senator from Maryland was such an adept in the Yankee plan of answering one question by asking another. To me and to my people the proposition seems very plain. This matter of the inequality of representation in the more popular branch of Congress has been a matter of complaint for a long time. Our people cannot understand why in fairness, when we are going back to lay the foundation of our organic law, two gentlemen in Maryland—and I respect them as highly as the Senator does, because I am myself a Marylander by birth—shall count in representation and in voting equal to three gentlemen in Iowa, or why one white man in South Carolina should count equal to two white men in Iowa. This is an idea which the Senator does not seem to have looked at. If these men are not fit to vote, why should they count against us who are fit to vote?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the honorable member, and I have answered him, I think, by anticipation, by calling his attention to what Mr. Madison said was the received opinion of the Convention, and I do not think any member on this floor is higher authority than Mr. Madison; I speak with all respect to my friend from Massachusetts:

"It is not contended that the number of people in each State ought not to be the standard for regulating the proportion of those who are to represent the people of each State."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That was the argument in determining the present Constitution; but in an attempt to change it, we must look for a different rule.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, I understand that; but Mr. Madison says, in speaking of the sense of the fathers of that day, who were perhaps as wise as we are, that the true rule was that the whole number of people in a State ought to be the standard for regulating the representation of the State. The honorable member from Iowa confounds, as the honorable member from Massachusetts throughout his whole argument confounded, the right of suffrage with the right to be represented. They are altogether distinct. If they are not, the representation from Iowa ought to be diminished. If representation under the Constitution is to depend upon the exercise of the right of suffrage, Iowa should be confined to those whom she permits to vote, and the whole number of persons in her State, white or black, who are excluded from voting ought to be deducted from the enumeration. But it is one matter when you are considering the question of representation, and another when you are considering the question who is to vote. The negro who does not vote in Maryland, like the white woman or the infant who does not vote in Iowa, is to be protected. Protected how? By having representatives from the State who have charge of the interests of the State, of everybody in the State. Nobody pretended when the Constitution was formed that the negroes would not be counted independent of the right to vote. Mr. Madison, in the same number of the Federalist already cited, dealing with the propriety of counting only three fifths of the slaves, says:

"It is the character bestowed on them by the laws under which they live; and it will not be denied that these are the proper criterion; because it is only under the pretext that the laws have transformed the negroes into subjects of property, that a place is disputed them in the computation of numbers; and it is admitted, that if the laws were to restore the rights which have been taken away, the negroes could no longer be refused an equal share of representation with the other inhabitants."

Not meaning by that, that they would be entitled to vote as the other inhabitants were entitled to vote, because they were not regulating by the Constitution suffrage qualification, but the right to be represented. Minors, women, black or white, with or without a property qualification, all within the limits of a State, have a right to have themselves considered in ascertaining who is to represent that State, numerically, because in proportion to the number of representatives do you increase the security of all the citizens who may be within the limits of a State.

Is there any difference in principle—I speak it certainly with no disrespect to the women of Iowa—between counting them and counting blacks in ascertaining the number of Representatives to which Iowa is entitled?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We would feel some objection, if we felt in regard to negroes as the Senator does, to having our women balanced off all the time by negroes in Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. But you have not the prejudice.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Some of us have.

Mr. JOHNSON. It ought to be with you a question of principle altogether. I understand you to say that the women of Iowa are to be considered in the same light with the blacks in Maryland. Well, if they are, and they are counted although not privileged to vote, why should not the negro be counted in Maryland although deprived of the privilege of voting? The honorable member confounds the question of representation with the question of the right of suffrage, two things, in my judgment, altogether distinct. Supposing now that the honorable member is in favor of this provision, while you lessen by it our representation by deducting from the whole number of our population the negro portion of the population, why is it that you increase our taxation? Is that just? And yet that is precisely what your resolution proposes. It does not leave it as the Constitution originally had it, because that subjected us only to taxation apportioned by considering a colored person as equal to three fifths of a man. You have increased it now by abolishing the institution of slavery so that every man within Maryland who may be black is to be counted, and you tax accordingly. Thus with one hand you deprive us of a portion of our representation and with the other you increase the amount of our taxation; and from what I know of the very astute, and I was about to say cunning, people of the State of Massachusetts, that is what they would not agree to if the principle was applied to them. [Laughter.]

I do not know, Mr. President, that I have succeeded in satisfying my friend from Iowa, although I think I ought to have satisfied him provided it be true that in his opinion there is no distinction between the ladies of Iowa and the blacks of Maryland. [Laughter.] I think there is a very material distinction.

I must hasten on to a conclusion. The honorable member from Massachusetts has presented a question not applicable to the measure before the Senate, but as he introduced it, I beg leave to say a word on the subject. He holds that, independent of any constitutional provision, the authority is in Congress to regulate suffrage because of the clause of the Constitution guarantying to each State a republican form of government. That is a new idea; and the honorable member seemed to think that it was so novel that it required very extensive research. He began before the Revolution, and he brought up at the times of the Revolution, carried us into Faneuil Hall and gave us the bugle voice of James Otis heard in the morning sun, charming, electrifying, and invigorating every heart in the State of Massachusetts, and in the country; and he brought us down from 1775 even to the present time, and he said there was an aggregation of authority to show that the power was possessed, and one of the elements of the aggregation was the guarantee clause. How did he make it out that there is no republican form except where there is representation? Upon the ground of the declaration of James Otis, which must have had the effect attributed to it by the honorable member—and his name ought to be borne in reverence through all time by every American citizen—that taxation without representation is tyranny. But to what did he apply it? England claimed the right to tax us through her Parliament where we were not represented at all. Was he dealing with the question of the right of suffrage? Unquestionably not.

Mr. SUMNER. He did in all his arguments and speeches.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, I beg the Senator's pardon. Although by no means multifarious in my reading as the honorable member, I may say that all speeches of that description I have perhaps read as often as he has.

It was taxation without representation against which he spoke. Did he mean that Massachusetts and Rhode Island were not republican governments? If he did not mean to exclude them from the category of republican governments, then in the opinion of James Otis Maryland is yet a republican government, and so is every State in the Union a republican government. Here, as was the case with my honorable friend from Iowa, he is confounding the right of suffrage with the right of being represented.

Not only is the bugle voice of James Otis appealed to, but the action of the fathers, the sense and spirit of the Constitution, all, in the judgment of the honorable member, demonstrate that this right of suffrage should exist. A republican government, says the honorable member, is an American idea. Cicero and Aristotle and Socrates and all the worthies who have preceded us in times past knew nothing upon the subject. They were, in the sense of the term in American constitutional jurisprudence, behind the age. The first time the true thing was discovered, that which animates the heart and nerves the arm of all who may be within the reach of such a government, a republican government, was here within the limits of the United States. Suppose I concede it; and I have not time to question it with the honorable member. What was the idea here? Did our fathers consider that any one of the thirteen States who finally came under the provisions of that Constitution and have ever since constituted a part of the nation were not living under republican forms of government? The honorable member will pardon me for saying that to suppose it is to disparage the memory of those great and good men. There was not a State in the Union when the Constitution was adopted that was republican, if the honorable member's definition of a republican government is the one now to be relied upon. A property qualification was required in all at that time. Negroes were not allowed to vote, although free, in most of the States. In the southern States the mass of the negroes were slaves, and of course were not entitled to vote. If the absence of the universal right of suffrage proves that the government is not republican, then there was not a republican government within the limits of the United States when the Constitution was adopted; and yet the very object of the clause to guaranty a republican government—and the honorable member's citations prove it—was to prevent the existing governments from being changed by revolution. It was to preserve the existing governments; and yet the honorable member would have the Senate and the country believe that in the judgment of the men who framed the Constitution there was not a republican form of government in existence. Here is what Madison says in the forty-third number of the Federalist. After reciting the clause—I have not time, nor is it necessary to read more than a sentence or two from it—he says:

"To the second question it may be answered, that if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government."

And what does that suppose? He tells us: "which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution."

So that the honorable member and the Senate will see that the very object of the clause was to secure by force of the guarantee the existing governments, and nothing else. Are we less republican now than we were then? Then these one hundred and seventy-one thousand people who now constitute a portion of the population of Maryland, or their ancestors, were slaves; now they are free. Is it less a republican government because the slave then is the free man now? If there was nothing inconsistent with the existence of a republican government in not only excluding the black man from the right of voting but claiming the right to hold him as a chattel, he being a man, is it not less anti-republican to exclude him now that he is a free man? What difference does it make, when we come to examine the question whether a republican government exists or not, that he is black? The definition of the honorable member places his charge of anti-republicanism as against the present forms of constitution upon the ground of the right to vote. I suppose the black man has no more natural right to vote than the white man. It is the exclusion from the right that affects the judgment of the honorable member from Massachusetts. Voting, according to him, is a right derived from God; it is in every man, inalienable, and its denial, therefore, is inconsistent and incompatible with the true object of a free government. If it be such a right, it is not less a right in the white man than in the black man; it is not less a right in the Indian than in the white man or the black man; it is not less a right in the female portion of our population than in the male portion. Then the honorable member from Massachusetts is living in an anti-republican government, and he ought not to stay there a moment if he can find any government which would be a government according to his theory. None has existed since the world commenced, and it is not at all likely that any will exist in all time to come; but if there is any such Government to be found on the face of the earth, let him leave Massachusetts, let him hug that angelic delusion which he hopes will encircle the whole world, and go somewhere where he can indulge it without seeing before him every day conclusive evidence that no such illusion exists at home. Do you let every black and white man in Massachusetts vote? No; he must be able to read and write; he must be able to read the Constitution of the United States, and he must be able to read it in English. German or Frenchman, Italian or Chinese, if he has not been here long enough to be able to read the Constitution of the United States in English, he cannot enjoy that inalienable right which it is tyranny to deny. He is taxed without representation, and that, in the language of Otis, is tyranny. Leave Massachusetts, I beg the honorable member, just as soon as you can, or you will never be supremely happy. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, if I admit that the honorable member is right to that extent, if you are to take as a test of what a republican form of government is, the estimate entertained of it by our fathers, then every one of these governments is republican, and so far from your being authorized to invoke the guarantee to accomplish the purpose the honorable member has in view, it is his sworn duty, according to my view of it, as a Senator of the United States, to insist that those governments shall stand as they are, that being the very object of the guarantee clause.

I omitted or was about to omit to remark upon another of the guarantees to which the honorable member referred, the authority to interfere by legislation with this right of suffrage consequent upon the second clause of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery. He says it may be done under that section. With due deference to him, I think it is very obvious that it cannot be accomplished under it. In that I believe the whole of the committee of fifteen concurred. He proposes to regulate the right of suffrage in the States in order to secure to the negro the privilege given him by this constitutional amendment. What is that privilege?

"Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction."

In no court, before no tribunal of any description—executive, legislative, or judicial—of the United States, or of any State, would it be pretended that the institution of slavery now has any existence; it is abolished. What did we think? That difficulties might be thrown in the way of this constitutional provision by some of the States. This institution had been the growth of more than a century. It had wound itself into all their domestic arrangements. They were as much attached to it as the North is attached to any domestic institution of its own. They honestly believed that there was nothing wrong in it—I mean the majority of them. They honestly believed that there was nothing injurious in it to the country. They honestly believed that it was a divine institution. We have cured them of that, or if we have not, they have cured themselves by beginning this war. But looking to the condition in which the southern mind was at the time, we thought—I for one thought it, and for that reason I voted for this second section—that these negroes, although no one would have a right to hold them in slavery, might still in point of fact be enslaved. How enslaved? Be denied some right incidental to the destruction of slavery. Then we said, it may be, looking to the decisions of the Supreme Court, that the mere abolition of slavery will give to Congress no legislative power. That court in a variety of cases have decided that nothing can be done by Congress under any clause of the Constitution which does not confer upon that body some power. A mere negation of a right clothes Congress with no legislative authority. Now, if we abolished slavery at once and did nothing more, it might be that Congress could not legislate at all on the subject, and these people would be left to the mercy of the legislation of the States in which the institution had existed. In order to guard against that we adopted the provision to be found in the second section of the constitutional amendment. And what is that? "Congress shall have power"—to do what? "To enforce this article." By what? "By appropriate legislation." That is, Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce this article. And what is this article? An article declaring that slavery shall no longer exist in the United States. Does the honorable member mean to say that no man is a freeman who is not entitled to vote? You would make slaves of one third of the people of Massachusetts; you would make slaves of all the women of Massachusetts, if that be the test.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. My argument is, that if, to carry out the prohibition of slavery and to complete its abolition it shall be regarded as necessary to give the franchise, it is within the power of Congress to give it. And now I will ask my honorable friend to give the Senate the benefit of his opinion on this precise point. If Congress under that clause can secure equality of civil rights, may it not, a fortiori, secure equality in political rights, under that clause? I do not ask the Senator whether in his opinion it may under that clause give equality in civil rights. I assume that. I most sincerely accept it, and the Senator, knows very well that the Senate has acted accordingly. Senators all about me have assumed that power; and now I ask the Senator, as a constitutional lawyer, to whom we refer every day, whether if you can do the one you cannot do the other?

Mr. JOHNSON. I answer that in the negative very decidedly, and have only time to give a few reasons for it. There are certain rights which belong to a freeman. He has a right to contract; he has a right to support himself; he has a right to do everything necessary to make him a freeman, or rather to enable him to enjoy life as a freeman, that any other freeman can do; but he is just as much a freeman without having the right to exercise the political right of franchise as he is with the right; for otherwise the result would follow which I have just stated, that there are a great many who are not freemen now in Massachusetts. The whole female sex not only are not, but never have been, free women. The whole object of this clause is not to give to Congress the right to interfere with the power of the States over the political status of their population, but to prevent the States from interfering with the right of one who has been a slave and remains in the State, to do what a white man can do under the general laws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. To secure the rights essential to freedom.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly, the rights essential to freedom, and nothing else.

Mr. WADE. Voting is essential.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is begging the question.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not the franchise more essential than the other?

Mr. JOHNSON. No.

Mr. SUMNER. Is it not foremost?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. I considered myself a freeman a good while before I was twenty-one years of age, and I had not the right of franchise. I should consider myself a freeman, if I was to go to Massachusetts, during the time that I was living out the residence which her laws require to enable me to vote; and I should consider myself a freeman, too, if I could not read the Constitution in English. How essential is it to secure freedom in Massachusetts that Congress should interfere with that? It is absolutely necessary.

Now, as to this "appropriate legislation;" the honorable member has referred more than once to the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland. What was that? The question, with reference to which the observation alluded to by the Senator was made by the Chief Justice was, whether the Congress of the United States had the power to establish a Bank of the United States. They came to the conclusion that it had, and why? Upon several grounds: first, that it was included within the power to regulate commerce; and secondly, that it was included in the power to collect taxes; not that it was necessary, not that commerce could not go on and taxes could not be collected without it, but if Congress thought that such an institution was an appropriate one to enable them to have a better regulation of commerce and to collect the taxes and preserve the money of the United States better, and with more facility than they could without it, they had a right to select that institution. If the honorable member had read the whole of that decision—

Mr. SUMNER. I have.

Mr. JOHNSON. No doubt he has; if he has he must have found—he has not cited that passage—that the learned Chief Justice says it must not be entirely foreign to the object placed within the legislative power of Congress; it must be connected with, if not absolutely necessary to, the exercise of the power. Now he is begging the whole question when he says that it is absolutely necessary, in order to make a man a freeman, that you should give him the right to vote by legislation. That assumes that every freeman has a right to vote. Is that true? The honorable member from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] the other day said, and said what he is borne out in by all the authorities—it is not necessary to go to Cicero and Socrates and the many illustrious names that came so eloquently from the Senator from Massachusetts; you find it everywhere—that the right of suffrage, the right of voting, depends upon governmental regulation; there is nothing innate in it. The question who is to exercise it is submitted to the discretion of the Government. Shall a man without property vote? Every State in the Union at one time said no. Shall a man without property hold office? Every State said no. Shall the slaves vote? Every State said no. Shall the alien vote? Almost every State said no. In some of the States they are admitted to the right of suffrage, and I think improperly in any, as a matter of expediency, but not in all; but are they any the less freemen? Is any inherent and natural right violated by such an exclusion? Certainly not. The right grows out of political institutions, and exists, or does not exist, just as the Government who establishes them thinks proper to grant it or to deny it.

I could speak much longer upon this subject, but I am troubling the Senate and exhausting myself.

Now, a word or two as to the effect of this proposition. You think it will produce peace and quiet. I hold your opinions, gentlemen, in as much respect as I hold the opinions of any one; but I entertain a very different opinion.

Mr. SUMNER. There I agree with you.

Mr. JOHNSON. As to this particular amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then as to this, I am sure I must be right. The honorable member and all of us are very anxious to bring about a state of peace and quiet and harmony. We want to be brothers all; all sectional differences to be forgotten; all former animosities to be cast into oblivion. We want to be what our fathers were, what your ancestors of Massachusetts were in their relation to the men of South Carolina; in the language of Webster, going shoulder to shoulder through the perilous conflict of the revolutionary struggle, moistening every field of battle in which they were engaged with their joint blood, feeling the arm of Washington resting on them alike for support. We want the men of Massachusetts to be now in relation to the men of Maryland and Virginia what they were then. We invoke the memories of the past. We pray that the spirit of Washington may be over and around us to guide us to a correct conclusion. He went the moment he was called to defend Massachusetts. He drew his sword first in the struggle to maintain her rights, and he did not go alone. Every southern State rushed to her rescue. We came out of that struggle as we went in, brothers, animated by an equal love of country, hoping to achieve for the benefit of all a national renown, and a prosperity without example in the world's history. Madness separated us. The South, I beg you to remember, has not been wholly to blame; why it is unnecessary to say. There is no man conversant with the history of the times but must feel—I felt it in this Chamber, I felt it in the peace conference—that although the treason was culminated into actual perpetration by the South, it never could have occurred but for the misjudged conduct of the North. I do not designate any particular State. But we have gone through the struggle, and we are out of it, successfully out of it. How is that former concord to be reestablished? By seeking to deprive the southern States of any part of their political influence, leaving them subject to your taxing power, even increasing that power as against them? By passing laws adverse to what is known to be the sentiment of their people—laws which assume, not that they are not competent, but that being competent they are unwilling to perform the duty which they owe to their country? Gentlemen, you misunderstand them.

No man in this Chamber raised his voice earlier, or did more, to the extent of his means, to defeat the parricidal effort to destroy this Government than I did; but I knew these people. I knew—and therefore my apprehensions were the greater—that if their leaders should be put in a situation in which they could arouse the hearts of those people, they had that within them that would cause them to go to the utmost limits men could go; and so far they have gone. It is idle to deny—I rather feel proud of the fact—that they exhibited upon the battle-field the highest elements of human courage which can be exhibited upon such an occasion. Some of them may have acted with an entire forgetfulness of all the injunctions of humanity. So have some of our soldiers. Private houses have been given to the flames, and innocent women and children driven out at night to seek shelter of whom and where they could. But these are exceptions; and these we should try to forget. How can this strife be soonest forgotten? Bring them back; take them by the hand; say to them, "You have wandered away from the household of your fathers; you have seen the error of your ways; you ask to return; we receive you with open arms and with warm and gushing hearts," and rely upon it that such men as will be sent here will be as faithful to the Constitution as either of us. Look at the conduct of their military men and our military men. How do they meet? How do Grant and Sherman and Meade and Sheridan and Thomas meet their former comrades, lately their enemies, now that the war is over?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not put them in command of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON. They meet them as brothers. They do not put them in command of our Army, but they would have no objection to it, I am sure, because they have entire and absolute confidence in their honor. But you are not putting them in command of the Army. The honorable member and no member of the Senate has a right to say any southern man would be sent into this Chamber and take the oath that you require and not observe it or any oath that you may administer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have taken an oath and broken it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; but broken how, and broken when? The honorable member is not to be told that there existed throughout the country in every section of it a large class of intelligent men who believed that the States had a right to secede. Your late lamented President so announced in a speech made by him when he was a member of the House of Representatives. I thought I had by me a copy of the Kentucky resolutions known to have been written by Mr. Jefferson, but I cannot find it at present; but the first of those resolutions which was adopted by the unanimous vote of the Legislature of Kentucky says in so many words that the Government of the United States is nothing but a compact, and that the States have the right to decide for themselves whether it is broken or not and can act accordingly. A terrible doctrine, a mischievous doctrine; but who did it come from? From one who had taught the public mind of the South, from the very apostle of human liberty, from one who hated tyranny and loved freedom; and his teachings and the teachings of others who succeeded him made the South believe that they had that right. They just as firmly believed it as my honorable friend from Maine and myself believe in the contrary doctrine. You cannot deal with a people of that description as if they were criminals acting without the pretense of right.

Now, the honorable member from Massachusetts says they cannot come in because the case of Luther vs. Borden, as decided by Mr. Chief Justice Taney, reported in 7 Howard, holds that that is a matter to be passed upon by Congress. That is a great mistake. With due deference, it says no such thing. It says that under the clause of guarantee Congress must necessarily decide whether the government which they are called upon to guaranty is republican. It says that under another part of the same clause which makes it the duty of the Government to protect a State against domestic violence or foreign invasion, Congress is to pass laws for that purpose. They passed the act of 1793 making it the duty of the President on the application of the Legislature of a State, if it was in session, or the Executive of the State if the Legislature was not in session to interfere; and the court go on to say that under the act of 1793—and I ask the honorable member's attention to it—the President is to decide and nobody else.

Mr. HOWE. Congress gave him the power.

Mr. JOHNSON. But as long as that law exists he must decide and nobody else. The act of 1793 has not been repealed, and all the subsequent legislation auxiliary to it is also upon your statute-book unrepealed.

Mr. HOWE. I take it it has not passed beyond the power of Congress to resume it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is another matter.

Mr. HOWE. Under the Constitution the power belongs to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. But once executed, it does not belong to Congress. But now let me apply it to the honorable member from Wisconsin. Has not Congress exercised the power? Have you not admitted all these States into the Union long ago? You say they are out. I say they are not. That is a question to be tried.

Mr. HOWE. That is not the issue between the Senator from Maryland and myself. I never used the expression that any of these States were out of the Union. I have, on the contrary, constantly protested that nothing had gone out of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am glad that I misunderstood the honorable member. Then they are not. How did they get in? By being recognized by Congress; and if they are recognized by Congress, how is Congress to get them out? It is a power that is exhausted when it is first executed. Once in, they are in forever.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that is your position.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is my position. They are in forever, so far as Congress is concerned; but whether in or not, one thing is certain: we have a right to receive them into this Chamber.

Mr. SUMNER. Suppose they get out of practical relations with the Government, what then?

Mr. JOHNSON. They can resume their practical relations. Heaven forbid that a man the moment he stops any particular relation is supposed to be never thereafter capable of resuming it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Both sides must agree, must they not?

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Maine says with the agreement of both sides. Did we agree that they should go out? I have heard the honorable Senator say from time to time that not only we did not agree, but we would not admit it, and we have been carrying on a war now for four or five years, costing countless treasure and half a million of lives to get them in, and I thought we had accomplished it, and I was never more surprised in my life than, when I thought we had succeeded in the object of the war, to find gentlemen advocating a position which made us a great deal worse off than when we began it.

However, that has nothing to do with the purpose I had in view when I was interrupted. I want them in. I think it is the only way in which you can pacify the country. I am not afraid of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The honorable Senator misapprehended my question, and I will state it now in order that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the reporters. My friend from Massachusetts put the question, suppose they are out of practical relations to the Union, what then? The reply of the honorable Senator who is speaking is that they may resume them. I ask, may they resume them at their own will entirely, or does it require the assent of the other party with whom those practical relations have been dissolved? That is my question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I say under the circumstances they can, just as much as the other party. Each party has the same right to resume that the other has. You do not deny to Congress the right to resume relations with them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot force it upon them.

Mr. JOHNSON. You can enforce it upon them, or you can—

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot compel them to send Senators and Representatives here if they do not choose to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the fault of the original Constitution. You say they have no organized governments. Have they not Governors and members of their Legislatures and of their judiciary? What branch of government is it that they are without? How are their people now governed? By you? No, except very partially. How are all their domestic concerns regulated? How are all their contracts enforced? How are their marriages solemnized? How is property conveyed? By your laws? No. By the State laws. Nobody doubts that; and yet although they are clothed with all the attributes of government, and just as absolutely clothed with them as they were before the war commenced, you say they are not governments within the sense of the Constitution because the moment you admit that they are State governments in the sense of the Constitution, then they have the right to be represented here.

But I have wandered from the purpose I had in view. What I wanted to say was—and I say it now in conclusion—that to quiet the country, to reinstate it in the prosperity which it had and which it has temporarily lost, to bring us all together again as one family, endowed with the capacity of winning a name which will make us the envy of the world, let us take them to our bosom, trust them, and as I believe in my existence, you will never have occasion to regret it. You will, if the event occurs, look back to your participation in it in future time with unmingled delight, because you will be able to date from it a prosperity and a national fame of which the world furnishes no example, and you will be able to date from it the absence of all cause of differences which can hereafter exist, which will keep us together as one people, looking to one destiny and anxious to achieve one renown.

Mr. CONNESS. If it would not trouble the Senator, I estimate very highly the value of his opinion upon the question I propose to suggest, and I would like to have it. In speaking of the relation of those States to the Government now, did I understand the honorable Senator to mean the State governments that now exist in those States, or the governments that existed there prior to the rebellion?

Mr. JOHNSON. They have a right to change their government. You know that is an inherent right.

Mr. CONNESS. Have they changed their government? Have they not organized the government now existing under compulsion?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir. I do not so understand it as a question of fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. HENDERSON obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand my friend from Missouri does not desire to speak upon the pending question this evening, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate to go into executive session, I will make that motion.

Mr. GRIMES. With the permission of the Senator, I desire to move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 33.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. For the purpose of enabling the Senator from Missouri to have the floor on Tuesday morning, I will move that the pending resolution be postponed until Tuesday at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 265) granting a pension to John Hoffman, of Madison county, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Fogg, of the State of Maine; and

A bill (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

CHARLOTTE BENCE.

Mr. GRIMES. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 33.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 33) for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry, which directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Charlotte Bence, of Bloomfield, Davis county, Iowa, widow of Captain Philip H. Bence, of company F, thirtieth regiment of Iowa volunteers, on the pension roll, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, for and during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the bill passes to its third reading, I will inquire what this case is. Is there any report about it? Does it come from a committee?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; it passed the House of Representatives, and met the approval of the Committee on Pensions in the House; was sent to the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, and has been reported back by that committee without amendment. The chairman of the committee is here and will explain it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is not establishing any new precedent, I have no objection to it. Does it come within the rule of other pensions?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Yes, sir, it comes within the rule we have established with regard to those killed on detailed service and furlough. This man was sent to transact some business in Iowa and was shot down while on his way home by guerrillas.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it not a larger pension than is granted to most widows?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It is a captain's pension.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inquire if the widows of all captains receive the same pension.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. They do.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill No. 33.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 33) in relation to the Court of Claims. It proposes to repeal the fourteenth section of an act approved March 3, 1855, entitled "An act to amend an act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855; and from the final judgment, or decree, in all cases heretofore decided by the Court of Claims of the character mentioned in the fifth section of the act of March 3, 1853; an appeal is to be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States at any time within ninety days after the passage of this act, except in cases where the amounts found due by the court have been paid at the Treasury; and the regular session of the Court of Claims is hereafter to commence on the first Monday of December in each year.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator from Illinois what is this fourteenth section of the former act that is proposed to be repealed?

Mr. TRUMBULL. These are the words of it:

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That no money shall be paid out of the Treasury for any claims passed upon by the Court of Claims till after an appropriation therefor shall be estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Perhaps I had better explain in a word what the object of the bill is. The seventh section of the bill, which passed in 1853 I think, provided for appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States from the Court of Claims. That section is in these words:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of final judgments by said court, or, on appeal, by the said Supreme Court, where the same shall be affirmed in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of a copy of the said judgment, certified by the clerk of said Court of Claims and signed by the chief justice, or, in his absence, by the presiding judge of said court. And in cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of said claimant, or the same is affirmed by the said Supreme Court, interest thereon, at the rate of five per cent, shall be allowed, &c.

The seventh section of the act provided that the payments were to be made out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims. It has been the custom of the Treasury to make an estimate to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims each year, and out of that estimate the judgments are paid. The fourteenth section declares that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury for any claims passed upon by the Court of Claims until after an appropriation therefor shall be estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury. I did not think when the fourteenth section was adopted that it altered the law as prescribed in the seventh section, but when a case went up to the Supreme Court of the United States they refused to entertain jurisdiction of the appeal on the ground that under this fourteenth section there was a discretionary power in the head of the Treasury Department to pay the judgment or not. Their opinion is very short, and I will read what they say upon that point:

"We think that the authority given to the head of an Executive Department, by necessary implication, in the fourteenth section of the amended Court of Claims act, to revise all the decisions of this court requiring the payment of money, denies to it the judicial power from the exercise of which appeals can be taken to this court."

Mr. GRIMES. Who gave the opinion of the court?

Mr. TRUMBULL. That opinion was announced by Chief Justice Chase. The law specially provided for appeals. They have refused to entertain appeals; but I understand if that fourteenth section were out of the way, they would entertain appeals. I do not think, and I did not think at the time, that the fourteenth section altered the previous provisions of the act; but the court have come to a different conclusion, and regard it as vesting a sort of discretionary power in the Secretary of the Treasury. The sole object of this bill is to remove this obstacle to taking appeals to the Supreme Court. I say the sole object; but another clause in the bill fixes the commencement of the term of the court on the first Monday of December instead of the first Monday of October. It does not make any difference in the old law, except to repeal the fourteenth section.

Mr. DAVIS. My own opinion is, and always has been, that every debtor ought to pay his debts. If the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary would introduce a bill authorizing every creditor of the Government to pursue the Government just like a private individual, and that the Government, when a judgment was had against it, should at once pay the judgment debt, I think it would be the best policy that could be adopted.

I know of no higher obligation than to pay a debt due from the Government to its creditors. It to me is a farce, a denial of justice, for a Government to owe honest debts and to allow no mode for coercing payment. For myself, I am in favor of that obligation of the Government as far as practicable. I think, in relation to the bill now under consideration, that whenever there is a judgment of the Court of Claims against the Government for a debt, the law ought to instruct the Treasury officers at once to pay it. The idea of a Government that is intended to protect all people and to secure to them what are their rights, being bound by no practical obligation for the payment of its debts, has to my mind always been an absurdity and a piece of high injustice. I hope, therefore, that the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will propose an amendment to this law requiring the Treasury officers, whenever there is a judgment in favor of a citizen against the Government for a debt, to pay instantly the amount of the judgment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Kentucky certainly will have no objection to this bill. It may not go as far as he desires, but the very object of this bill is to repeal a clause which the Supreme Court construe as giving a sort of discretion to the Treasury Department to pay a judgment or not. Now, I desire to repeal that, so as to take away any such implication. It was upon that very ground that the Supreme Court decided that they would not entertain jurisdiction of an appeal. We wish to remove that, so as to make the judgment what the law intended it to be, a final judgment.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The reason very often why judgments are not paid is because there is no appropriation for them, and the remedy would be to make appropriations. I know personally that a great many judgments are not paid because there is no appropriation out of which they can be paid, and it might be that if your Court of Claims worked very fast, they would draw upon what you provide to pay other things. In looking at this matter, therefore, it is right to look at your means and put your officers in possession of them.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt that the suggestion of my colleague is altogether correct, and I would remedy the defect of want of appropriations by giving the same chancery proceedings in favor of a creditor against the Government that I would give in favor of a creditor against an individual debtor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky one question, with his permission, and it is this: if a party should present his claim to the Court of Claims, and that court should give a very close construction to the law or the contract upon which the claim is based and reject it, and the party thought he had a good case, would not the Senate be willing to give an appeal to the Supreme Court? That is one of the purposes of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; and I would be willing to vote a provision to make it mandatory upon the court to entertain the appeal. I would not leave it to their discretion at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill does not leave a discretion.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the objection to the existing law, as made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to be that the Supreme Court have assumed it as a principle of the law, that where it is discretionary with the Treasury officer to pay the debt or not, the court will not entertain an appeal. I would be willing to modify the law by requiring the court to entertain the appeal. I would not allow them to assume any such position, and in that way to baffle the right of a citizen who thought he had not received justice in the Court of Claims from the benefit of his appeal. But the objection in my mind is this: that where a court of the United States, be it the Court of Claims or any other court, have rendered a judgment in favor of a citizen against the Government, the Government should be required to pay it, and the officers of the Treasury who disburse the public moneys should be required to make payment upon the rendition of the judgment; and if there is not on hand money with which to pay the judgment, the creditor of the Government should have the same right, by sequestration and other chancery proceedings, to seize upon the property or funds of the Government that he would have to seize upon the property or funds of an individual. I want the Government to set the highest example of the payment of debts, and I want the Government to be held to the most direct and reasonable responsibility for the payment of all its debts to the citizens of the United States. I think that is the duty of the Government toward every citizen.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would prefer that this bill should lie over for the present. I should like to have an opportunity to look at it. I have some doubt about it myself, and unless my friend from Illinois is very anxious to have it considered to-day, I prefer that it should go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not at all anxious about it. I think it is a thing that ought to be attended to. The construction of the law has been such as not to carry out the intention of Congress. The Senator seems to have taken alarm, and supposes that here is a bill opening the Treasury. It does not affect the course of proceeding in any respect whatever, except to remove the obstacle which the Supreme Court say exists to entertaining appeals. The practice, ever since the passage of that law, has been for the Treasury to make an estimate for the judgments of the Court of Claims, and Congress appropriated in its appropriation bill last year a certain amount—I do not remember what it was; two or three hundred thousand dollars, I think—to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims; and out of that appropriation the judgments have been paid.

The Court of Claims is a very cautious court; and it has never rendered judgments up to the amount that was appropriated to meet them; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GUTHRIE] who spoke on that subject must have spoken in reference to the law as it existed before the act of 1863 was passed. Before 1863 the judgment was not conclusive. In 1863 we amended the Court of Claims act, and made the judgment of the Court of Claims conclusive; and it was to be paid out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for the purpose of paying the judgments of the court. That was our law; but as a safeguard we also required the Supreme Court to take jurisdiction of all cases where the judgment amounted to more than three thousand dollars; and also of all cases where the judgment would form a precedent for the decision of other cases, or where a constitutional question was brought in issue; but the Supreme Court refused to entertain these appeals. The law of 1863 is a positive statute requiring them to do so. This is its language:

"That either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from any final judgment or decree which may hereafter be rendered in any case by said court wherein the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, under such regulations as the said Supreme Court may direct."

Now they refuse to entertain that jurisdiction, because of the fourteenth section of the act of 1863. That was not in the original bill as it was reported from the committee. The seventh section made provisions for paying the judgments of the Court of Claims out of appropriations made by Congress for that purpose. When the bill was pending, Mr. Hale, who was then a member of the Senate, and who was opposed to the bill, moved the fourteenth section, which is as follows:

"That no money shall be paid out of the Treasury for any claim passed upon by the Court of Claims till after the appropriation therefor shall be estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does that have to do with the question of appeals?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Supreme Court have decided that, it gives the Secretary of the Treasury a supervisory power to pay the judgment or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Even if it does, that does not affect the question of appeal.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They say that it affects it in this way: that the judgment of the Court of Claims is not a final judgment; that under the fourteenth section of this law, the Court of Claims is a mere commission to examine, a sort of board of auditors, and their judgment not being final, they are not a court that can enter judgments because they are subject to departmental supervision under the fourteenth section. Now, there is no such supervision exercised; it is not in point of fact done; but the judgments are paid out of the appropriation which we make; and the sole object of this bill is to repeal that fourteenth section. When it was moved in the Senate as an amendment—I recollect the circumstance very well—I thought it had no effect whatever, and I recollect making no objection to having it put upon the bill; but it has presented a very serious difficulty. The object of this bill is simply to repeal that fourteenth section, so that the Supreme Court will take jurisdiction of the cases. Now, if my friend from Maine wishes the bill to go over so that he may have an opportunity to examine it, I have no sort of objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am entirely willing that it shall go over if any Senator wishes that course taken. I move, therefore, that any further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 264) granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, of Chenango county, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 265) granting a pension to John Hoffman, of Madison county, in the State of New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 266) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Fogg, of the State of Maine; and

A bill (H. R. No. 267) granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore.

STURGEON BAY SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 85) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a breakwater and harbor and ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, which has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the Secretary commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 21, noes 10; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, February 9, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. B. W. CHIDLAW.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, beginning with the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where the call rested on last Friday.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed:

The petition of Henry Pease and others, praying for pensions; and

The petition of citizens of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, asking for pensions.

ALTAZERA L. WILCOX.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, of Chango, New York; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am instructed by the committee to ask for the consideration of this bill at the present time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that there shall be granted to Mrs. Altazera L. Wilcox, widow of a private of company B, one hundred and fourteenth regiment of New York volunteers, a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN HOFFMAN.

Mr. BENJAMIN also, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to John Hoffman, of Madison county, in the State of New York; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am instructed by the committee to ask the consideration of this bill at this time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that there shall be granted to John Hoffman, of Madison county, New York, a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during his natural life.

Mr. SPALDING. Let the report be read, that we may understand the necessity for this bill.

The report was read. It states that John Hoffman enlisted in the United States marine service at Philadelphia on the 16th of August, 1827. While serving on the Grampus at Pensacola, he was twice admitted to the hospital there for disease contracted while in the line of his duty; and he was finally discharged at New York on the 6th of May, 1830. It is well established by the testimony of respectable persons that the petitioner has never recovered from the disease he contracted on ship-board while in the line of his duty. He is aged and in very destitute circumstances, and the committee therefore report a bill for his relief.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISABELLA FOGG.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Isabella Fogg, of the State of Maine; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am instructed by the committee to ask for the consideration of this bill at this time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that a pension shall be granted, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to Mrs. Isabella Fogg, of the State of Maine, to commence from and after the passage of this act, and to continue during her natural life; she having been totally disabled while acting as nurse on board a United States hospital boat, near Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I notice that this bill is not in the form usual with bills of this character, which generally provide that the pension shall continue during widowhood. I therefore move to amend the bill by striking out the words "natural life" and inserting the word "widowhood."

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think I can satisfy the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] that his amendment should not prevail. I am aware that it is the general policy of the Government in granting pensions to confine them to the widowhood of the parties. That, however, is in the case of persons receiving pensions in consequence of being widows of those who have lost their lives in the service of their country. But this pension is proposed to be granted on account of the services the party herself has rendered; not because she is the widow of a soldier or sailor, or of any one who has lost his life in the service, but in consequence of her having been herself disabled while in the service. Hence the committee were in favor of granting her a pension during her natural life, thus placing her upon the same footing, in that respect, as if we were granting a pension to a soldier or a sailor. She appears to have been in the service as a nurse, and it is in consequence of disability incurred in that position that this pension is asked and granted by the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. This is not a matter in which I am particularly interested, but I would suggest that the principle the House has adopted in all this class of cases is to grant the pension during widowhood. The object of the pension is to give support to the widow, and if that support is provided at any future time by marriage, the necessity for the pension ceases. I only make this suggestion from the fact that the action of the House has always been to give a pension to a woman during her widowhood.

Mr. STROUSE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a single question. I desire to inquire whether this class of persons are not provided for in the general law the same as males who have been in the service?

Mr. BENJAMIN. They are not provided for.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think they ought to be provided for by general law. There is a large class of persons who have rendered service in this way, and who are no doubt entitled to the bounty of the Government.

Mr. BENJAMIN. We have had the matter under consideration, and the law, we think, will undoubtedly be extended so as to embrace employes of the Government.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will not prevail. This is not, as I understand, the case of a woman who asks a pension on account of the disability or death of her husband. The pension is asked on account of a disability incurred by the lady herself while acting as a nurse attending on our sick soldiers. I see no reason why a woman who has contracted a disability in the service of the Government during this war is not as much entitled to a pension for life as a man who has contracted disability in the same way.

In the case of a woman who applies for a pension on account of the death of her husband or father or brother, a different principle, of course, applies. The pension in such a case is granted upon the principle that the woman is dependent upon her husband or father or brother for support, and when she marries she ceases to be thus dependent. But in such a case as this, where the woman herself has been in the service of the Government, and has while so engaged become disabled, she should have a pension for life. Thus far I am in favor of "women's rights."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I desire simply that the House shall understand this question. There is one important distinction which gentlemen seem to overlook. In the case of a person disabled, the general law gives him a pension during that disability; and whenever the disability ceases—it may cease in the course of a year or two—the pension ceases. But whenever we pass a special act, that act continues in force during the lifetime of the person receiving the pension, whether the disability continues or not.

Now, the controlling principle of all our legislation in regard to pensions granted to widows has been that such pensions are granted to aid the recipients to obtain a livelihood during their widowhood, and that in case of the remarriage of a widow, the necessity for her obtaining a livelihood by her own exertions ceases. Hence the pension, according to the principle of our pension law, continues only during widowhood.

My reason for offering my amendment is that I object to the provision of the bill in this respect, because it is contrary to the general rule which has been established by the House, limiting these pensions to the widowhood of the recipient. I only desire that the principle established in previous cases shall be followed in this instance.

If there is to be any change in this respect, it should, it seems to me, be a change in the general law. We should not say that in nine cases out of ten the pension shall be during widowhood, and that in the tenth case it shall be during the natural life of the party.

The object in such cases as this should be, I think, not to grant a certain stipend during the life of the pensioner, but to furnish her assistance so long as she may need it; and if she changes her condition so that she no longer requires assistance, the pension, according to the whole policy of our pension laws, should cease. The amendment which I have offered is in accordance with our previous legislation, and I think it should be adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I call for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

The report was read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

In my opinion—and it is the opinion in which the committee share—it would make no difference as to the granting of this pension, if this lady now had a husband. She herself has rendered the service; she herself has suffered the disability. I will add that her disability is total; but notwithstanding that, she would, by being placed on the pension rolls, come within the rule adopted at the Pension Office, and be obliged to undergo a close examination, as every other pensioner is obliged to do. Should she perchance recover, I apprehend the pension will cease.

As I said before, we are granting this pension in consequence of the disability she has received, as a reward for the services she has rendered, and not in consequence of the services of a husband or son, or any other person. This being the case, we cannot see why any distinction should be made between a soldier, one of the male sex, to whom this Congress would grant a pension, and one of the other sex. I trust, therefore, the amendment of the gentleman will not prevail, and that the House will grant the pension asked for during her natural life, whether she marries or not. She has rendered service, effective service; and the fact of that service has been attested by some of the most prominent officers who have served during the war. They certify to the assiduity with which she attended to the wounded soldiers during all the campaigns of the army of the Potomac, and the other armies of the country. Before the close of the war she was disabled in this way. She is totally disabled. There is no possibility of her recovery, and but little probability of her living for many years. I trust that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill asks for a pension in consideration of her own services, and not in consideration of the service of her husband. Now, I do not see why that pension should cease if she should marry. I hope that this House will not be so ungallant as to say that a lady who has rendered important service to the country shall only have her pension so long as she remains single and shall cease when she marries. It is wrong. I hope that the House will be equally gallant to this lady as they are to the gentlemen to whom they may grant pensions. We do not say that the pension shall cease if a man marries, and I do not see why the pension should cease in the case of a female if she should happen to marry. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. BENJAMIN. We are not proposing to change the law on the subject at all. We do not put this upon the ground stated by the gentleman, although I may agree with his views in regard to the granting of this pension. This pension is granted upon the ground that this party has earned this pension, and does not claim it by virtue of any services of her husband. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we will provide that all restrictions shall be taken off, and her pension doubled, when she gets married, for services rendered to her country. [Laughter.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is she not a married woman now?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not know. I suppose she is a widow.

Mr. JOHNSON. If she turns out to be a married woman she will have to kill her husband in order to get her pension. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA K. V. MOORE.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Virginia K. V. Moore; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the name of Virginia K. V. Moore, daughter of Richard D. Moore, deceased, late of company K, seventy-second regiment of Illinois volunteers, shall be placed upon the list of invalid pensions, and there shall be paid to her guardians, from the passage of this act, eight dollars a month until she has attained the age of sixteen.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to strike out the words "from the passage of this act," and to insert "from December, 1863, the date of the death of Mr. Moore."

Under the general law the pension begins from the date of the death, if the application be made within one year. In this case the father died and soon after the mother, leaving a girl of some eight or nine years, and a year passed in proceedings for the appointment of a guardian. Now, in my opinion, there is no reason why the same rule of law should not apply. Here is an orphan whose case is manifestly just, and I hope that her pension will commence from the death of her father.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the bill I have reported is in conformity with the rule established by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that in cases of this kind the pensions should commence at the passage of the act. I think myself this orphan child should receive a pension from the date of the death of her father; but on account of the rule I am precluded from accepting the amendment. There is no doubt from the investigation I have given this case that her father died of disease contracted in the line of his duty. The Commissioner of Pensions, for reasons satisfactory to himself, said it did not come under the general law, and therefore we have been compelled to report this special act.

While I am not authorized to accept the amendment of the gentleman, yet if the amendment is proposed to the House I certainly shall vote for it.

Mr. SLOAN. I am very glad to hear the gentleman who reported this bill announce that he thinks the amendment is just and that it ought to be adopted, although the committee have adopted a technical rule in the other direction.

Mr. TAYLOR. I demand the previous question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. TAYLOR. I yield for a moment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to call the attention of the House to this question, which is one of some importance to the people of the country, one in which the whole of the people are interested. I exceedingly regret that the attention of this House once having been called to this question, it decided it as it did; and I exceedingly regret also that the attention of the House seemingly cannot be called to this question. It is one in which all our constituents are interested. I ask, sir, what is the object of the committee in making the distinction they do between these cases and those which arise under the pension law as it now stands? I see no reason for it. Why has the committee reported in favor of this case? It is because the party would have been entitled if they had come into this Congress, or if they had applied under the pension laws, to have drawn their pension from the time the pension is asked. It is because they are entitled to it by reason of the services which were rendered by the father and husband of the claimants. Then, sir, it is not a gratuity, as was expressed by gentlemen here when this question came up some days ago. It is not a charity, but it is a right that the laws do not provide for, and that is the reason the case is before this House. The parties under the rule of the pension department are not entitled to a pension. They come in here and ask us to supply the defect in the law. They come here and this committee reports to the House that they are entitled to a pension, but the House establishes a rule that it is inequitable or unjust to allow the pension to commence from the day of the death of the husband or father for whose services the pension is to be allowed.

Now, sir, I appeal to this House to reverse its decision on this subject. I believe that gentlemen will find that their constituents will demand at their hands another rule to govern in these cases than that which the House adopted a few days since. I very much regret to see a disposition shown on the part of this committee that is not so liberal and generous as I believe the people of this country will demand of their Representatives in the protection of the widows and orphans of our volunteer soldiers.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I hope my friend from New York will withdraw the previous question for a moment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will do so.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am glad my friend from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] has sought this opportunity to bring this question before this House. I think when it is fully understood by every member on this floor they will be ready to sustain this report of the committee in this as perhaps in every other case.

In reference to this question, if the Committee on Invalid Pensions were to grant all the prayers of the people all over this country, if we were to yield to all the appeals of members who come before us with appeals for sympathy, we would impoverish the Treasury. We cannot do it. We must establish some general rule by which we are to be governed. We have attempted to do justice in this and in all other cases. I will now refer more particularly to this case. It is the case of a mere child of eight years of age, whose father died of disease contracted in the service. The mother has since died, and the application is made on the part of the guardian for a pension.

Now, it does not come under the general pension law; it is, as my friend from New York says, a gratuity outside of the pension law; but upon a close examination of the whole case, believing that this claimant was a minor, and that her father died in consequence of his services to the country, we came to the conclusion that we should give her eight dollars a month until she arrives at the age of sixteen years, and we have so reported.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Certainly, certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the gentleman hardly states the case with fairness when he says that this child is not entitled to a pension.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I did not say so.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the proof before the committee was overwhelming that her father died from disease contracted in the service, although upon the roll technically there had been placed, somehow or other, no one can tell how, a statement that he died of disease contracted before he entered the service.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman not to make a speech; I yielded to the gentleman to make an explanation, and not a speech.

Mr. SLOAN. I had expected—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has censured the Chair for not compelling gentlemen to obey the rules. He now states that he declines to yield, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is therefore out of order.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman for further explanation.

Mr. SLOAN. I understood the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated distinctly that he only yielded for explanation, and did not yield for remarks.

Mr. SLOAN. I only wish to add a word, and that is, that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have passed upon the proof which established the fact that the father died from disease contracted in the service, and for that reason they have awarded this pension to his orphan child. It is not a matter of charity, but a matter of justice. It is a case which not only appeals to the charity of the House and of the nation, but which is also sanctioned by the strictest principles of justice.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has stated the views of the committee exactly. The committee would not have reported in favor of paying this poor young girl eight dollars a month until she is sixteen if they had not been perfectly satisfied that it is a just and meritorious claim, but the committee did not feel themselves justified in changing the principle adopted not only by themselves, but also by the House, in reference to all these cases, and that is that the pension shall commence from the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would ask the gentleman if this pension is not to be given for the services of the party?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I admit that, but it is utterly impossible in most cases to get all the testimony in reference to those services. In many cases the application is not made for five or ten years after the death of the parent. Would you go back in such cases and date the pension from the death of the individual, when the evidence by which you can establish the claim has been lost?

Now, I repeat again that this case is outside of the pension law. The Committee on Invalid Pensions considered themselves instructed by the House a few days ago in the adoption of this very principle by an almost unanimous vote, when they decided that the pension should commence at the passage of the act and not at the death of the petitioner whose case comes up outside of the law. And now we have reported not only in accordance with the opinion of the committee, but in accordance with the implied instructions from the House. I believe the report is right, and I hope it will be sustained by the House.

Mr. HILL. If I understand the principle upon which pensions are granted, it is upon the ground of services having been rendered. If this bill is placed upon the ground that it is a gratuity, then I am opposed to it. I do not understand that it is the duty of this Congress to grant gratuities to any person or to any class of persons. But if, as I understand to be the true state of the case, this relief is to be granted upon the ground that service has been rendered to the country by the parent, and that the loss of the life of that parent deprives the infant of its natural guardian and protector, then I see no reason why the date of the compensation should not be the date of the loss of life. Why fix an arbitrary rule which is not governed by any reason or any good common sense, and say that the pension shall begin when the act granting it shall happen to be approved, although the application for the pension may not be made for years? Why do we say that some time in the future the pension shall begin to run, although the right to the pension began at the very time the husband or the father died, as the case may be?

If the members of this committee regard the vote of this House the other day as an instruction to them, then I think it is highly important that the House should give instructions the other way, should give instructions founded upon some principle of justice and equity and right, rather than upon an arbitrary rule that cannot be supported upon any of these grounds. The loss of the relative is the ground of the claim, and the compensation should be granted from the very moment that loss occurred, although the claim may not be presented for twenty years. In that way you will have a correct, clear, and well-defined principle—not one that is entirely arbitrary, but one based upon a sufficient reason. And I am in favor of such an amendment to the bill as will recognize that principle.

Mr. PERHAM. I feel that I ought to say a word in regard to this subject. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] has taken it upon himself to censure the Committee on Invalid Pensions for what he is pleased to denominate a want of interest for the soldier, and to intimate that the committee is not coming up to the demands of the people in regard to this subject. Now, I am unable to state what information the gentleman has in regard to the action of the committee—

Mr. FARQUHAR. The report of the committee, which was acted upon by the House some ten or fifteen days ago.

Mr. PERHAM. I wish to say in reference to this matter, that we have now in this country, I believe, the most liberal pension laws that are in existence in any country upon the face of the earth; and that they are administered in the most generous spirit of any laws administered anywhere.

You also have a Pension Committee, which committee has labored incessantly, from the time of their appointment until now, two days every week, for the purpose of providing for such kind of meritorious cases as the present law fails to provide for. After we have labored in this way, I do not think it is for any member upon this floor, who has not the means of knowing what that committee is doing, to get up here and say that we are not meeting the expectations of the people.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERHAM. Not now; I have but little time. We have measures now before us which we are maturing as rapidly as possible, and we will be ready to report them by and by, that no doubt will fully meet the expectations of the gentleman and the country. At least we mean that it shall do so; we mean to perform our duty in every sense of the word in regard to this subject.

Now, in regard to the special bill under consideration, I desire to state that there are propositions to go back for twenty, thirty, and I think in one instance, forty years for a pension. And others ask that we shall go back for ten years, or five years, or three years, and so on.

The committee came to the conclusion that they had better establish some principle by which they would be guided as a general rule; not, however, an arbitrary rule, from which they would not deviate under any circumstances. With this view they prepared the bill that is now under consideration.

There may doubtless be a question in the minds of some whether this applicant is actually entitled to a pension. We have come to the conclusion that under all the circumstances it is proper that Congress should grant relief; and we are not aware of any better principle than that which we have adopted. Should there arise any isolated case which, in the opinion of the committee, should demand a departure from this general principle, we would hold ourselves at liberty to depart from it in such a case, unless the House should give us instructions to the contrary.

Mr. TAYLOR. The Commissioner of Pensions has ruled that this case does not come within the general pension law, for the reason, I believe, that he is governed by the record evidence in all such cases; and the record in this case shows that in the opinion of the surgeon who certified the disability this man had lung disease before he entered the service. Notwithstanding that certificate, however, there is overwhelming evidence that this man was in sound health at the time he entered the service, and that the sickness with which he died was contracted while he was in the service. I can only explain the certificate of the surgeon on the supposition that there must have been a clerical error by which this man's name may have been inserted in a certificate designed for another person. But for that opinion, expressed in the certificate of the surgeon, there would have been no difficulty with the Commissioner of Pensions, and this child would have received a pension under the general pension law.

In regard to the rule by which I was governed in drawing this bill, I felt that I was acting under the instructions of the committee. As the chairman of the committee has referred to this matter, I do not know that it will be deemed a breach of privilege for me to state that when the question was taken in committee upon the adoption of this rule, seven members were present, only five of whom voted, three voting for the rule and two against it. There was not a majority of the committee voting in favor of it; and therefore I can hardly regard it as an established rule of the committee. But if it is a rule, I consider it as wrong in its application to this case. I shall therefore vote for the amendment. I believe that this child should receive a pension from the date of the death of her father.

Mr. HILL. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR]—it may be an excessive encroachment on his courtesy—I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Is not this bill now presented because technically the case does not come under the existing pension laws, while meritoriously it is a good case?

Mr. TAYLOR. That is the fact.

Mr. HILL. I will ask the gentleman further, whether in his view any valid principle which would deprive the child of the pension from the time of her parents' death (which gave her the ground for her claim) until the present time would not also deprive her of it for all time to come?

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly. Now, if the gentleman has no further inquiry, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment of Mr. SLOAN.

The question being taken, there were, on a division; yeas 43, noes 43—no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. INGERSOLL, called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

No quorum having voted upon the amendment,

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. SLOAN and BENJAMIN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 58, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 60, to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, with sundry amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports on the following cases; which were laid upon the table:

The petition of Mrs. Priscilla E. Hodge;

The petition of Henry May for increase of pension; and

The petition of David T. Stephenson for relief.

ALBERT NEVINS.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Albert Nevins; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the name of Albert Nevins, late a private in company K, ninety-second regiment New York volunteers, shall be placed upon the list of pensioners at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month, in lieu of eight dollars per month heretofore allowed him, to commence from the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill will go over until next Friday.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report of the Committee of Claims of the 19th instant be printed for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. What report is that?

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee of Claims in reference to claims from persons in the disloyal States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What is the necessity for printing five thousand copies of this report?

Mr. LAFLIN. This is simply a report of the Committee of Claims concerning cases continually presented in regard to claims for damages sustained during the rebellion by persons claiming to be loyal residing in the rebel States. The resolution reported by the Committee of Claims was adopted by the House. Now, every member of the House daily has applications from individuals from every section of the country to know what will be the action of the House on this subject; and for the purpose of meeting this call it is desired that the report should be printed. I will state that the printing of this number of this report will cost $4 50 per thousand, twenty-five dollars in all; and that is all it will cost.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF BENICIA, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of citizens of Benicia, in Solano county, California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SELECTION OF LAND IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill to facilitate the selection of lands granted to the State of California by the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BUSINESS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. ELIOT moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LE BLOND. What business upon the Speaker's table does the gentleman wish to get at?

Mr. ELIOT. When we go to the table the gentleman will see.

Mr. LE BLOND. I simply wanted to know whether there was a negro in it, as I thought this was a "white man's day." [Laughter.]

RECEPTION OF MAJOR GENERAL OSTERHAUS.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts yields to me for a moment.

I understand there is in the Hall a distinguished general of the United States Army, who represents a loyal foreign element in the country, and who has shown military skill and great personal courage upon many a well-contested battle-field during the war for the preservation of the Union. In order to pay him that honor and respect he deserves for his valuable services, I move that the House take a recess for five minutes, and that the Speaker present him to the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. A recess was accordingly taken.

[The SPEAKER having conducted Major General Osterhaus to the Speaker's desk, said: Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, when the people of this Republic took up arms for its salvation there were thousands and scores of thousands born in other lands who had emigrated to these shores to live and to die under our flag, and who, impelled by the same patriotism as our native-born citizens, rallied to its defense on many a battle-field. Conspicuous among these is the gentleman whom by your order I have the honor of introducing to you to-day, Major General Osterhaus. [Applause.]

Major General Osterhaus said: Gentlemen, you must excuse me if I cannot speak your language as I ought. I came to this country and I tried to learn it very hard. But the troubles to overcome were stronger than my tongue. Mr. Speaker is right. I came to this country to find in the flag of the United States the symbol of individual freedom and of general liberty. I once opposed a confederacy in the years 1848 and 1849. I tried hard to defend the German union, and yet we had to succumb. But we were guided by the symbol of the stars and stripes. And when the question came up in this country to defend that symbol, I thought I was in duty bound to try to defend it again. And I did as far as I could. I did my best. But, gentlemen, I did not learn to speak English. You must excuse me. [Laughter and applause.]

General Osterhaus then came down from the Speaker's desk and was introduced to the members of the House by the Speaker, after which the House resumed business.]

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT renewed his motion to take up from the Speaker's table the Freedmen's Bureau bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 60, being a bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate, and upon that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were severally agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the amendments, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Colonel William G. Moore.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message of the President of the United States in response to a resolution of this House.

To the House of Representatives:

In reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th ultimo, requesting the President of the United States, "if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the House any report or reports made by the Judge Advocate General, or any other officer of the Government, as to the grounds, facts, or accusations upon which Jefferson Davis, Clement C. Clay, jr., Stephen R. Mallory, and David L. Yulee, or either of them, are held in confinement," I transmit herewith reports from the Secretary of War and the Attorney General, and concur in the opinion therein expressed, that the publication of the papers called for by the resolution is not at the present time compatible with the public interest.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, February 9, 1866.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 7, 1866.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to acknowledge the reference of the House resolution calling for the reports of the Judge Advocate General on the cases of Jefferson Davis, Clement C. Clay, D. L. Yulee, and S. R. Mallory. These reports were made for your own information, and contain abstracts of evidence and ex parte proofs in possession of the Bureau of Military Justice. Pending any action in respect to the parties accused, the publication of these reports is, in my opinion, incompatible with the public interest. The concurring opinion of the Attorney General is also herewith submitted.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

Mr. CONKLING called for the reading of the report of the Attorney General; which was read, as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 31, 1866.

SIR: Sundry reports of the facts that go to show that Jefferson Davis and other rebels have been guilty of high crimes have been made to you as the chief executive officer of the Government. Most of the evidence upon which they are based was obtained ex parte, without notice to the accused, and while they were in close custody as military prisoners. Their publication might wrong the Government or the accused, or both. While I see that much wrong may flow from the publication, I cannot see that any good would come from it.

In my opinion, then, public and private justice alike demand that they should not be made public. I am, sir, very respectfully,

JAMES SPEED,
Attorney General.

To the President.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1867, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union yesterday with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on agreeing to the amendments from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give me permission to offer an amendment to one of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before he moves the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to move to insert a proviso after lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine, on page 7.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the committee is to strike out lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Then I will move to insert after line one hundred and thirty-seven the following:

For purchase of Oakman & Eldridge's wharf, $135,000. Provided, That this amount shall cover the whole cost of the property, and that the purchase can be made upon terms mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of the Navy and the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charlestown.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I submit that that amendment is not in order; it contains an appropriation that has not been considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. This matter was considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. This amendment was not.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. This is a proviso I propose to a clause that was considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The committee propose to strike out this clause. The gentleman can attain his object by voting against striking out these lines.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. But that will not enable me to get in the proviso.

The SPEAKER. That may probably be.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose any one who would vote against the appropriation would vote against the proviso also. It would make no difference.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was to insert on page 3, after line forty-five, the following proviso:

Provided, That there be transferred from the appropriation for fuel to the contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was to strike out lines one hundred and nineteen, one hundred and twenty, one hundred and twenty-one, and one hundred and twenty-two, as follows:

For purchase of Seavey's Island, $105,000. Provided, That a perfect and approved title in fee to the whole island can be obtained and vested in the United States for that sum.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to say a word on that amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will be allowed ten minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object, unless I can have ten minutes to reply.

Mr. STEVENS. Am I not entitled to an hour to close the debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should have claimed that right before the House proceeded to vote on the amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose to speak myself, but I wish the gentleman from Maine to be heard.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. SPALDING. And I object unless I can have ten minutes.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 80, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Boyer, Brandegee, Brownell, Buckland, Reader, W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Culom, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Goodyear, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hill, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Marshall, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, Moorhead, Nicholson, Orth, Paine, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Ross, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stilwell, Thayer, Trimble, Trowbridge, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Williams, and James F. Wilson—62.

YAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hart, Hayes, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Newell, O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Warner, William E. Washburn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Brooks, Bundy, Culver, Davis, Denison, Driggs, Glossbrenner, Harris, Higby, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, Noel, Raymond, Ritter, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Smith, Francis Thomas, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Wentworth, Winfield, and Wright—40.

So the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was not agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For purchase of the right of drainage through the yard, now held by the city of Charlestown, $25,000.

The question was taken; and there were, upon a division—ayes 27, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Mr. BANKS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and NICHOLSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 35, noes 62.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SLOAN called for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

RECEPTION OF GENERAL CROOKE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire, at this time, to submit to the House a proposition similar to one that has before been submitted this morning. This House has shown a very proper disposition to receive with due respect and honor the defenders of the country.

I have the pleasure to announce the presence in the Hall of Major General George Crooke, whose services with General Sheridan in the valley of the Shenandoah, as well as his performances elsewhere, will be so well remembered by this House. I therefore move that the House now take a recess in order to enable the Speaker to introduce General Crooke to this House.

No objection was made.

The House accordingly took a recess.

[The SPEAKER having, amid applause, conducted General Crooke to the Speaker's desk, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, for a portion of the time in which the country was engaged in the war for its salvation, the valley of the Shenandoah was the scene of many defeats of our national arms. But toward the close of the rebellion there appeared a general, who, by his magnetic power over his men, and by his brilliant dash, stands perhaps equal to the bravest of all in the land; and he converted the valley of the Shenandoah from a valley of humiliation to a valley of victory for our national arms. Prominent among the generals who aided Phil. Sheridan in his heroic achievements was Major General George Crooke, whom I have now the pleasure, by your order, to introduce to you. [Applause.]

General Crooke. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

The members of the House were then introduced to General Crooke by the Speaker.

At the conclusion of the recess the House resumed its session.]

RECEPTION OF GENERAL WARD.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to state to the House that when the war began, in 1860 and 1861, we had in the western country some men who took the side of the Government in the most determined manner, and who have been promoted to high positions for meritorious conduct during the war. There is upon this floor to-day a general from my State, in whom I have the greatest confidence, and for whom I have the highest admiration. He entered the contest at the beginning of the war, when but few men from that State dared uphold the banner of their country. He not only fought in many of the battles in the beginning of the war, but he marched with his troops under General Sherman in his magnificent march to the sea.

I move that the House now take a recess for the purpose of giving the Speaker an opportunity to introduce to this House Major General William T. Ward, of Kentucky, who is one of the truest men of this country in every sense of the word.

No objection was made, and the House accordingly took a recess.

[The SPEAKER having, amid applause, conducted General Ward to the Speaker's desk, said:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, when the storm-cloud of war burst upon our land, the hearts of all loyal people from ocean to ocean warmed toward those brave men in the South who stood by the imperiled flag of the Republic. As you have just heard from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] General Ward, who stands beside me, was one of those gallant men. The country does him honor, as the House does him honor to-day; and I have great pleasure in introducing him to you. [Applause.]

General Ward said: I cordially thank the House for the kind reception which I have met with at their hands. When this unnatural and terrible revolution broke out, I swore in the innermost recesses of my heart to assist the Government in sustaining itself against that rebellion, and never to lay down arms until the last armed rebel should have been overcome. I was faithful to that oath, and I have within the last two or three months returned to civil life. Among the recollections which I shall be gratified to transmit to my latest posterity is the cordial manner in which you have received me to-day, for which I tender you my heartiest thanks. [Applause.]

General Ward then came upon the floor and was introduced by the Speaker to members of the House.

At the expiration of the recess, the House resumed its business.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

On page 6 strike out lines one hundred and thirty-five and one hundred and thirty-six, as follows:

For building for offices, $167,381.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

On page 7, strike out lines one hundred and thirty-eight and one hundred and thirty-nine, as follows:

For purchase of Oakman & Eldridge's wharf, $135,000.

On agreeing to the amendment there were, on a division—ayes 43, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 51.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 73, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Benaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Eckley, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Marshall, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Moulton, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sloan, Smith, Stilwell, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baldwin, Banks, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Buckland, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Hayes, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McKee, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Taber, Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, Warner, William E. Washburn, and Whaley—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Blow, Brooks, Bundy, Cobb, Culver, Denison, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, McCullough, Morris, Newell, Raymond, Ritter, Rousseau, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Wentworth, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

On page 7, strike out lines one hundred and forty-one and one hundred and forty-two, as follows:

For machine shop, main building, $298,612.

On agreeing to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 51, noes 54.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 66, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Barker, Benaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, DeFrees, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Farquhar, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, Morrill, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Trowbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Banks, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Darling, Dixon, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Latham, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McKee, McKuer, Moorhead, Myers, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Voorhees, and Warner—66.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Bidwell, Blow, Brooks, Bundy, Conkling, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, McCullough, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Newell, Niblack, Raymond, Ritter, Rousseau, Stevens, John L. Thomas, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Welker, Wentworth, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—43.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For machine shop, boiler wing, $191,480.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that the next appropriation will be kept in, as it is necessary.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For iron-plating shop, $98,922.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For quay-wall extension at derrick, $100,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For quay-wall extension at sewer, $100,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For dredging channels, $65,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For filling low places on new purchase, $100,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following:

For machinery for new machine shop, boiler shop, pattern shop, and smithery, $180,000.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 40.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING and DARLING were appointed.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 54.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 62, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Boaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Culom, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Farquhar, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Marshall, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Morrill, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shelbarger, Sloan, Smith, Stillwell, Thayer, Thornton, Townbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Baldwin, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Conkling, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hubbard, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Ketchum, Laffin, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Miller, Myers, Nowell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Warner, and Woodbridge—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Blaine, Blow, Brooks, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Dawes, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grider, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Edwin N. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Lynch, Moorhead, Morris, Noell, Patterson, Phelps, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Rousseau, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Voorhees, Ward, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—47.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House struck out the paragraph, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out after line one hundred and sixty-six and insert the following:

For protecting from destruction and decay the unfinished buildings and other structures already commenced, for which no appropriation is made in this bill, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out lines one hundred and seventy-one and one hundred and seventy-two, as follows:

For Buckley's patent drier with buildings complete, $30,000.

The question being taken on this amendment, no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HILL and GLOSSBRENNER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out lines one hundred and eighty-nine and one hundred and ninety, as follows:

For repair of dry-dock masonry and gates, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out line one hundred and ninety-one, as follows:

For quay-wall, $15,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the vote may be taken on the amendments in gross, unless some gentleman wishes to take a separate vote on some one of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will regard the House as concurring in all these amendments unless some gentleman desires a separate vote.

The following amendments of the committee were then reported, to strike out the following items:

For quay-wall, $15,000.

For iron and copper store No. 11, $35,000.

For ship-joiners' shop and timber-shed No. 12, $45,000.

For furniture and galley storehouse, $36,000.

For storehouse No. 14, $46,000.

For completion of stables, $10,000.

For new dredging machine, scows, and dredging, $45,000.

For new shears, $30,000.

For building for offices, $15,000.

The question being taken on the foregoing amendments, they were agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out line two hundred and ten and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the protection of property at Norfolk navy-yard, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendments were to strike out the following items:

For commandant's quarters, $23,245.

For quarters for officers, $50,000.

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines two hundred and nineteen and two hundred and twenty, and insert the following:

For the preservation of the property of the United States at the Pensacola navy-yard, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $20,000.

Mr. THAYER. I ask a separate vote on that.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add the following to the bill:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the first section of the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved May 21, 1864, as appropriates $250,000 for bounties for the destruction of enemies' vessels, as per act of May 17, 1862, be amended so that said appropriations shall be applied to all cases of destruction of enemies' vessels during the recent rebellion, and at the same rate as is provided for in the act to which reference is made.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe I must ask a separate vote on that.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, should anybody vote on that who does not know what it means?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say.

Mr. HALE. I ask to have the section of the act to which this amendment applies repeated.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the act be read.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The eleventh section of the act making the appropriation referred to contains this provision, that whenever it is necessary to destroy an enemy's vessel at sea instead of bringing it into port to be adjudicated upon under the prize law, a bounty shall be paid to the captors equal to $100 per man on board of the vessel destroyed; and that it shall be equal to $200 per man on board the enemy's vessel, provided the enemy's vessel be superior to the captors'. In case the enemy's vessel captured or destroyed is inferior to her captor, then the bounty to be paid is $100 per man on board the enemy's vessel. That is the regular provision of the prize law.

Now, when that act was passed, no appropriation was made for such bounties. At a subsequent session of Congress an appropriation of $250,000 was made to carry out the provisions of that law. The accounting officers of the Treasury construed the law to be applicable only from and after its passage. There is one case, however, in which an enemy's vessel was destroyed during this rebellion, anterior to the passage of the prize law, and the entire purpose of this amendment is to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to include that case, and pay to the captors just what is paid by law to captors made since the enactment of this law. There is but one single case.

Mr. HALE. What is the case?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I cannot give the name of the vessel, but it is a case that occurred since the breaking out of the rebellion, but before the passage of the prize law, and the whole object is to include that vessel in the settlement that is authorized by law to apply to all captures made since the law was passed. I will state that this amendment was drawn up by the Fourth Auditor, and was made to fit the case in question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope this matter will not be tacked on to this bill; it does not legitimately belong here, and the subject has not been considered at all by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It can be put in some of the bills now being considered in that committee. I hope the House will vote the amendment down because we do not understand it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will yield to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to read the law on this subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I send to the Clerk to be read the eleventh section of the prize law, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That a bounty shall be paid by the United States for each person on board any ship or vessel-of-war belonging to an enemy at the commencement of an engagement, which shall be sunk or otherwise destroyed in such engagement by any ship or vessel belonging to the United States, or which it may be necessary to destroy in consequence of injuries sustained in action, of $100 if the enemy's vessel was of inferior force, and of $200 if of equal or superior force, to be divided among the officers and crew in the same manner as prize money; and when the actual number of men on board any such vessel cannot be satisfactorily ascertained, it shall be estimated according to the complement allowed to vessels of its class in the Navy of the United States; and there shall be paid as bounty to the captors of any vessel-of-war captured from an enemy, which they may be instructed to destroy, or which shall be immediately destroyed for the public interest, but not in consequence of injuries received in action, fifty dollars for every person who shall be on board at the time of such capture. All ransom money, salvage, bounty, or proceeds of condemned property, accruing or awarded to any vessel of the Navy, shall be distributed and paid to the officers and men entitled thereto in the same manner as prize money, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have only to add that this clause does not call for any additional appropriation. It is only to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of the existing law.

Tellers were ordered on the amendment; and Messrs. BRANDEGEE and UPSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was to add to the bill the following as an additional section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no portion of the amounts herein appropriated shall be paid in violation of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEEDING TO-MORROW.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to propose that the House hold a session to-morrow for the purpose only of debate in Committee of the Whole upon the President's annual message; and that it shall not sit later than three o'clock, so as to give the Doorkeeper an opportunity to prepare this Hall for the proceedings of next Monday. No objection was made.

D. H. BINGHAM.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to move that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Mr. D. H. Bingham, of Alabama; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The motion was agreed to.

Some time subsequent thereto, Mr. DELANO said: I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House has just ordered the Committee of Claims to be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Mr. D. H. Bingham, of Alabama, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to agree to that disposition of the matter on yesterday.

Mr. DELANO. I want to inform the House of the character of this claim. It is one that comes within the rule which the House has already adopted, to reject all claims for damages of any citizens of disloyal States. I have here a report prepared to show that fact, and recommending that the claim of Mr. Bingham be rejected, which I was ready to make to the House when the committee was called. It is for the House to determine now whether they will reconsider the vote by which they referred the claim to the Committee on Military Affairs, or stand by the rule they have adopted.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to say a single word on this matter. Mr. Bingham, of Alabama, called on me and said that he had had referred to the Committee of Claims some papers in reference to certain claims, but he had understood that the matter properly belonged to the Committee on Military Affairs. He therefore requested me to make the necessary motion to get his papers before that committee. Before doing so I called upon the chairman of the Committee of Claims, [Mr. DELANO,] and he stated to me that I might make the motion and he would not object; that he did not like to make it himself, stating substantially what he has stated here to-day.

Mr. DELANO. I only wish the House to understand the case, and that it comes within the rule the House has already adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to discharge the Committee of Claims from the further consideration of the claim of D. H. Bingham, of Alabama, and to refer the same to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was not agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. MARSHALL. I was not in the House when the report of the Committee of Elections was presented in the contested-election case of Baldwin vs. Trowbridge, of Michigan. As I do not concur with the majority of the committee in that report, I desire to present a minority report, and ask that it be printed.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move that House bill No. 50, in relation to agricultural colleges, which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture, be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

THREE MONTHS' EXTRA PAY.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill extending the benefits of section four of the Army appropriation bill, approved

March 3, 1865, so as to give all officers of volunteers below the rank of brigadier general, who were mustered out of the service at their own request, or otherwise honorably discharged after the 19th of April, 1865, three months' pay proper, the same as if they had been mustered out with their respective regiments; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. W. J. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bill of the House No. 33, for the relief of Charlotte Bence, widow of Philip H. Bence, late captain of company F, thirtieth regiment Iowa volunteer infantry.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The House, agreeably to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The following section was pending when the House passed from the consideration of the bill on yesterday:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the justices of the Supreme Court shall designate one of their number, who, with the assistance of five commissioners, to be appointed by said justice so designated, and subject to the provisions of this act, shall frame general orders for the following purposes:

For regulating the practice and procedure of the district courts in bankruptcy, and the several forms of petitions, orders, and other proceedings to be used in said courts in all matters under this act;

For regulating the duties of the various officers of said courts;

For regulating the fees payable, and the charges and costs to be allowed, except such as are established by this act or by law, with respect to all proceedings in bankruptcy before said courts;

For regulating the practice and procedure upon appeals;

For regulating the filing, custody, and inspection of records;

And generally for carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

After such general orders shall have been so framed, they, or any of them, may be rescinded or varied, and other general orders may be framed in manner aforesaid, and all such general orders so framed shall, from time to time, when approved by the justice of the Supreme Court so designated, be reported to Congress with such suggestions as said justice may approve. The district judges shall be eligible to act as such commissioners.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend this section by adding the following:

No pay or compensation shall be allowed to such commissioners for services under this section.

Mr. JENCKES. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to insert in line forty-two of section eleven the word "to" before the word "send."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I move to amend by striking out in lines thirty-six and thirty-seven of section eleven the words "marshal of said district;" in line thirty-seven the words "as messenger;" in lines forty and forty-one the words "until the appointment of an assignee;" and also by inserting at the end of line thirty-six the following:

General assignee in bankruptcy residing in the county where such bankrupt resided at the time of filing his petition; and thereupon the estate of such bankrupt shall vest absolutely in such assignee for the purposes of this act; and the district judge of each district shall appoint a general assignee in bankruptcy for each county within his district, who shall be a resident of the county for which he is appointed, and shall give such bond as shall be required by such judge, and shall be an officer of the court, and subject to its rules and orders.

Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is to dispense with the services of a marshal, and avoid the increased expense of his fees to be charged upon the estate of the bankrupt. I deem it entirely unnecessary that, after the decree of the bankruptcy or the order declaring the applicant a bankrupt, the property should pass into the hands of the marshal before it vests in the assignee. No such proceeding was regarded as necessary under the former bankrupt law; but when the applicant was declared a bankrupt, the property vested in the assignee. I regard it as safer for all parties concerned—for a majority of the creditors and for the bankrupt himself—that there should be appointed, as under the former bankrupt law, an assignee in each county, who shall take charge of the estate. The services of a messenger or marshal are entirely unnecessary, and only tend to create additional expense which would be a very onerous burden upon a poor bankrupt.

I desire to sustain this bill; but I wish to have it made a law for the benefit of poor bankrupts, and not exclusively for the benefit of those who are rich. This bill provides that where a man owes debts to the amount of $500 he may take the benefit of the act; but if the system which we are to establish be burdened with the fees and expenses contemplated by the various provisions of this bill, it will cost a debtor $1,000 to obtain the benefit of it. I think there should be a provision under which the bankrupt could pay his $500, if he has that amount, in discharging his debts, instead of paying $1,000 to go through the expensive process which would be inevitable under this bill as it stands.

I believe that I am correct in this view. I had some experience under the former bankrupt act. I trust that my amendment will be adopted. It will not interfere in the least with the general character of the bill, while it will relieve the proceedings under it from all unnecessary expense. The appointment of an assignee in each county, as I propose, will not increase the number of officers provided for by the bill. My desire is that we should not create an unnecessary number of officers to eat up the little substance of these bankrupts.

Mr. JENCKES. The committee had in view the object which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] states that he desires shall be attained. And I think that if the gentleman will consider the matter more attentively he will find that the system of proceedings proposed in the bill will have the advantage of being less expensive and more efficient than the system he proposes. There is certain business which must be done by somebody other than the bankrupt or petitioner. Notices must be made out; property must be taken in charge for safe custody. If the gentleman will look at the close of the bill, page 67, he will find a provision that the word "marshal" shall include a marshal's deputy; and when the petition is filed, the warrant authorizes some person, deputy marshal, or some person acting as deputy marshal, to do this clerical labor.

That is the ordinary proceeding upon voluntary petitions; and in proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy there may be need of a messenger to take possession of the bankrupt's estate.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. This does not interfere with that.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman will allow me. The official assignee residing in the county is a local officer, and the property may be all over the State, or in half a dozen States, and there must be some one to go and take charge of this property in the intermediate time before the appointment of an assignee. It does not increase the expense one dollar, because the marshal is only allowed the fee established by law. He simply goes and puts his seal upon the property where he finds it.

Another thing; one of the great objections to the bankrupt law of 1841 and of 1860, and one of the most serious objections to the French bankrupt law, and to the English bankrupt law of 1849, was this appointment of local assignees. When they get property into their hands the creditors can never get it out of them. It was to prevent this waste of property that this provision was inserted.

I will show where it was obtained. I got it from the bankrupt law of Scotland, one of the best that I have ever seen. It was adopted into the bankrupt law of Massachusetts, and is now adopted into the bankrupt law of England. It has also been introduced into the bankrupt law of France. Having studied this subject carefully with the same object that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] has in view, I say that the precedents and history of this matter are in favor of this course of proceeding.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I do not see that the gentleman has answered my objection. My objection is to the intervention of the marshal when it is unnecessary. The assignee can take possession of the property as well as the marshal.

Mr. JENCKES. There must be some time before the filing of the petition either of the creditor or the debtor, and before an assignee can be appointed. Now, who is to take possession in the mean time?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. In the outset the district judge appoints an assignee for the bankrupt property in his district. He is there always on hand and performs the same duty that is required of the marshal. It is unnecessary that two officers shall be appointed to do the same thing.

Mr. JENCKES. He is a local officer.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I am aware of it.

Mr. JENCKES. The marshal can go everywhere.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The assignee can go everywhere. He is the owner of the property. It vests in him. He can take possession of property in any State of the Union.

Mr. JENCKES. The proposition of the gentleman is for one of two things, either to have a permanent official assignee, which, in my mind, is one of the greatest objections, or one in the intermediate time. It is better to have an executive officer.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. My object is to have a permanent official assignee to take possession of this property, who will act impartially between creditors and debtors. I object to special ones appointed by favoritism or superior vigilance on the part of the creditors.

Mr. JENCKES. The object of this law is to extricate the debtor from the hands of the creditors. I would rather have an officer of the court take charge of this matter than a favorite assignee selected by a portion of the creditors.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed for discussion for and against the amendment have now expired.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The most efficient feature, in my judgment, in this bill is that which is assailed by the gentleman from New York. If there is any one feature in the bill which secures the judicious administration of bankrupt estates, it is that feature which gives to creditors the selection of the assignees. Every one knows, who is at all conversant with such matters, that the ability of an assignee to manage a bankrupt's estate depends necessarily often on the extent of his knowledge of the business in which the bankrupt has been engaged. If you have an official assignee who is to take charge of the estate, you must deprive yourself of the advantage of having an assignee who is acquainted in particular with the business which is to come into his hands, because it is impossible you could appoint a man who is so completely a master of all kinds of business as to make a proper assignee in all cases of bankruptcy.

If you have an official assignee he will in many localities be so overborne with the responsibilities and duties imposed upon him by this trust, that it will be impossible for him to discharge the duties of that position with that degree of efficiency which the interests of the creditor and the bankrupt alike demand. I hope, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not prevail.

Mr. SLOAN. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] I desire to say that I believe it will save a large amount of expense if the proposition of the gentleman from New York is accepted. It will entirely obviate the expense of the marshal, acting as special messenger to take possession of the property of the bankrupt between the filing of the petitions and the final decree of bankruptcy. And if selections are properly made of assignees in each county, of men of character and integrity—and there is no presumption that such men will not be selected—they will act not only in obedience to law, but also in obedience to the rule which this commission, containing one justice of the Supreme Court, shall prescribe for the government of all these cases of bankruptcy. It will simplify these proceedings by reducing the expenses, and making them in all cases uniform. Instead of having assignees selected, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests, by the creditors and in the interest of the creditor, you will have an officer appointed as assignee who shall stand indifferent between the creditors and the bankrupt, who shall be responsible to the court, who shall govern his conduct entirely by the law and by the rule which this commission prescribes. It will simplify the proceedings, produce uniformity in their administration, and reduce the expenses, which I regard as a very important consideration in placing this law within the reach of all that unfortunate class who desire to obtain the advantage of it.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman has addressed the House upon a point that is not exactly before it. The question now is upon the appointment of a custodian of the property between the time of filing the petition, either by the debtor or creditor, and the appointment of an assignee by the court. This bill provides that the assignee may be nominated by the creditors, but the court may refuse to appoint that assignee and may appoint another man. This person has to do simply executive duties. It is just what the marshal now does if he is sent to attach property—nothing more. He has to give the notice, and he gets no more fees. It does not increase the cost of the proceedings. But if the official were to intervene he would have to pay three, four, or five times as much as the law now allows to deputy marshals.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island misapprehends the object of this amendment. It is to have, before any proceedings are taken under this law, an assignee appointed for each county in the judicial district—an assignee for all cases of bankruptcy.

Mr. JENCKES. That is just the thing I desire to prevent. And I wish to make one remark on that subject, quoting an eminent authority—a decision of the court that has led to the abolishment of all these evils under the English and Scotch system. Lord Eldon said in a case that required his particular investigation, that he discovered that where there were official assignees, official solicitors, and local commissioners, the bankrupt's estate was simply something for them to live on just as they pleased; that the bankrupt never got his discharge and the creditors never got a dividend.

Mr. SLOAN. With all deference to that great authority, and in deference to the opinion of the gentleman from Rhode Island, I still believe that in an American system of bankruptcy an assignee who is responsible to the court and to the law for the discharge of his duty would be preferable.

Mr. JENCKES. These marshals are thus responsible; they give bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. If this officer is thus appointed before proceeding is commenced, it dispenses with the interposition of a marshal.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what security he would require such an assignee as he describes to give. For instance, an assignee located in the city of New York, where millions of property must pass through his hands—what security would the gentleman require?

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman evidently did not hear the amendment read.

Mr. THAYER. I did, and I understand it.

Mr. SLOAN. It provides that he shall give such security as the judge making the appointment shall require.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman evidently does not understand my question. I ask what amount, in his opinion, would be adequate security, in the city of New York for instance.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The same that you require from the collector of New York city.

Mr. SLOAN. The amount required by the judge. The gentleman must be well aware that in administering judicial and financial affairs in this country, of necessity a much larger amount of money passes through the hands of our officers than can be reasonably provided for by bonds of security. Something is due to the character for integrity of the officers who are appointed, and it is, in my judgment, to be presumed that men will be appointed in those districts where large amounts may come into their hands whose character will be a far higher security than any money bond that can be taken. And yet this provision requires that such an amount of security on a money bond shall be given, as the district judge, regarding all the circumstances, may require.

Mr. THAYER. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. HOTCHKISS's amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by striking out the last word. I do so for the purpose of making one or two remarks applicable to this amendment and to this portion of the bill.

In the first place, I would like to know from the gentleman from Rhode Island about how many deputies he thinks it would be necessary, in either of the large districts, for the marshal to appoint in order to act as messengers in these cases.

Mr. JENCKES. Well, I can tell him that the practice, under the English law, and under the law of Massachusetts, and under the law of Scotland, is to appoint a special deputy. When the petitioning creditor or the petitioning debtor goes to the clerk's office with a petition there is a marshal present, or within immediate reach, for the purpose of protecting the property in the mean time. The party, creditor or debtor, as the case may be, makes application for the appointment of a special deputy to act in the intermediate time and to do the duties required by this act, which somebody must do, and it does not increase the number of standing deputy marshals in any district, and it does not increase the compensation of the marshal of the district to any extent except for his certificate upon the back of the warrant that he has appointed A or B his deputy or messenger for a particular purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I am very happy to have afforded the gentleman an opportunity to make a speech, although upon a point different to that which I put to him. He does not seem inclined to state the number of deputies, whether special or general, that the marshal would appoint in any large district. I wish to state that it would be a multitude which no man could number in these large districts.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman allow me to answer his question by asking another? What device can he propose by which the property of a bankrupt can be taken care of in the intermediate time between the filing of the petition and the entering of the decree?

I am not particularly in favor of this provision, but it is the best I have found devised in any law, and hence I adopted it.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely the device contemplated by the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. HOTCHKISS;] precisely the device which has been proposed in other bills—in the bill of 1862, in sections two and three for example.

Now, I want to make two or three practical suggestions. That there is no difficulty in providing for the preliminary custody of the property, I suppose the gentleman from Rhode Island does not propose to question.

Mr. JENCKES. I certainly do propose to question seriously the whole of this device.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, if I have any of my five minutes remaining, I will try to answer the gentleman. I say that there is not the slightest difficulty in providing for it. There is no magic in having a special marshal who could give no security practically for this purpose.

Mr. JENCKES. Yes, he does.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no magic in having a person to take charge called a marshal rather than somebody else. All you have to do is to provide for an assignee early enough in the proceedings.

My belief is that this section calls into existence an army of office-holders for no purpose under heaven. That is my first proposition. In the second place, I believe that the practical operation of this section and of the next section will be, in four cases out of five, to put into the hands of one or two fraudulent creditors the opportunity to manage the entire proceedings.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman state what he means by the phrase "fraudulent creditors?"

Mr. CONKLING. I will state it if I ever get the opportunity to do so. I was just going to state, when the gentleman interrupted me, that if some debtor, residing in the interior of the State of New York, owed $100,000—I will state a strong case for the benefit of the gentleman—and all his creditors resided in the city of New York, and he was about to become bankrupt, the marshal publishes a notice in the papers. This bill does not provide that he shall have the politeness that the Chinese have, who, when they invite you to dinner, furnish you with a list of all the persons who are invited to meet you there. This does not provide that he shall furnish a list of the creditors. Suppose that I am a creditor residing in the city of New York, and a notice is sent to me. There are other creditors residing near me, but I do not know who they are. The notice is that a meeting of the creditors is to take place one hundred and fifty miles from New York city. I attend the meeting, and if any one man has been omitted accidentally, or by design, that is a cause for postponing the meeting. Now, it is not likely that I shall attend those meetings for the mere purpose of postponement, and the assignee then comes into existence as the creature of the two or three creditors who may get the control of the matter in this way.

I believe that this whole machinery is unnecessary; I believe it is vicious; I believe it is bringing into existence an army of office-holders for no necessary purpose whatever. Now, if assignees are appointed, as suggested by my colleague, [Mr. HORTON], it would be a protection in the first place against this unnecessary creation of officers, and in the second place against a creditor having hold of the entire proceeding of the bankrupt, or—and now I answer the question of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES]—fraudulent colluding of the creditor with the bankrupt, to have him discharged and his debt sponged out by some agreement that takes place between them. That is what I call a fraudulent creditor.

Mr. JENCKES. This is entirely a practical question. The committee in preparing this measure have not acted upon their own personal views upon the subject. They have taken the experience of all the systems of bankruptcy in the world.

Now, the objections made here are two, if I understand them aright. One is, that it will increase the expense of the proceeding in bankruptcy. The other objection is that some fraud may be helped, or some collusion may be established, between guilty parties in the conduct of these proceedings. Both gentlemen from New York, [Mr. CONKLING and Mr. HORTON], have failed to point out how the expense of the proceedings can be increased one dollar, and I make the assertion, and I challenge those gentlemen to show it is not correct, that no such increase takes place.

Mr. CONKLING. Who is to pay these messengers?

Mr. JENCKES. The work has to be done, and it must be paid for exactly as other work under other laws must be compensated for—to no greater extent and in no other way.

Now, in regard to the objection as to fraud and collusion, I have failed to understand the explanation of the gentleman as to what he means by a fraudulent creditor. If this law has any merit whatever, it is that it prevents any possible collusion between fraudulent debtors and fictitious creditors. It provides that a debtor who places upon his schedule the name of a person to whom he is not indebted shall not receive his discharge. It also provides that a person who swears to a claim to which he is not entitled shall receive no dividend. It makes provision also for punishment incidentally, in certain ways, if such collusion or fraud is attempted to be practiced upon the court. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I dismiss from consideration entirely this subject of fraudulent creditors, or fraudulent preferences, or collusion between the bankrupt and his debtor.

The gentleman made another point, not an objection to the bill as it stands, but by way of suggesting an improvement. He thinks that official assignees, such as he proposes, would be more efficient than these temporary officers who give bonds in every instance, who are responsible to the court and responsible to the parties, liable to the debtor in an action if they exceed their authority, liable to the creditor if they collude with the debtor. The gentleman thinks that these officers would not be so efficient as official assignees in the different counties. Why, sir, I ask the gentleman how many counties there are, for instance, in the State of New York, and whether his plan would not increase the number of standing officers under this bill by just the number of counties. And I should like to know from him, as a lawyer, by what process the title and custody of property (because both must go together in this intermediate stage of the proceedings) passes from the debtor to the official assignee, supposing that the debtor files his petition in the city of New York and the property is located in Chataquo. What is the official assignee in New York to do in such a case?

The practical proceeding is this: if it is the debtor who makes the petition, he wants his property taken care of as it ought to be, and he asks the marshal to appoint somebody for the purpose. If it is the creditors who file the petition, they want to prevent the squandering or wasting of the property by this very collusion between fraudulent debtors and fictitious creditors which the gentleman hinted at. Their object is that the property, during that intermediate period, shall be taken care of in the proper manner and at the least expense. It is their interest that the property should be in charge of a person upon whom they can rely, who is responsible to them under the bond of the marshal of the district, who is directly amenable to suit at law or in equity, and if need be, to the process of the court for contempt.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me state what I wish the gentleman to answer. His bill provides that in every case an assignee shall be appointed to begin with. Now, I want to know what the gentleman means by saying that it will not increase the number of officers to bring into existence also in every case a special deputy, when you have an assignee at any rate.

Mr. JENCKES. The messenger is simply an intermediate agent, just as a receiver is in case of an attachment of property. The assignee is the person authorized by the court, upon the nomination of the creditors, to administer upon the insolvent's estate.

Mr. CONKLING. As the gentleman is very technical with me in reference to terms, I must remind him that the messenger is not in the attitude of a receiver; far from it. The assignee is in the attitude of a receiver. The messenger is a mere preliminary go-between, serving no purpose under heaven, as I contend, except to perform the ministerial business of giving notice, first, that a warrant has been issued; second, that "the payment of any debts and the delivery of any property belonging to such debtor, to him or for his use, and the transfer of any property by him, are forbidden by law;" and third, that a meeting of the creditors is going to take place. I say that the appointment of a marshal for this purpose, if you must have an assignee at any rate, is mere surplusage.

Mr. JENCKES. One of the duties of the messenger is to take possession of the estate, real and personal, of the debtor.

[Here he hammer fell.]

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the first three words of the section. I desire to make a suggestion in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in addition to those presented by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

If the gentleman from New York had examined this bill somewhat more carefully, he would have perceived that it contains a provision which destroys entirely the force of his objection founded upon the apprehension that, by some possible legerdemain in practice, one creditor may, contrary to the right and equities of the other creditors, assume the entire control of the debtor's estate, or that some unfair advantage may possibly be taken by one creditor of another. He would have seen in a subsequent part of the bill this provision for elections or appointments.

Mr. SLOAN. What section?

Mr. THAYER. Section thirteen. It provides as follows:

All elections or appointments of assignees shall be subject to the approval of the judge; and when in his judgment it is for any cause needful or expedient, he may appoint additional assignees, or order a new election. The judge at any time may, and, upon the request in writing of any creditor who has proved his claim, shall require the assignee to give good and sufficient bond to the United States, with a condition for the faithful performance and discharge of his duties; the bond shall be approved by the judge or register by his indorsement thereon, shall be filed with the record of the case, and inure to the benefit of all creditors proving their claims, and may be prosecuted in the manner provided by law for the prosecution of marshals' and other bonds given to the United States. If the assignee fails to give the bond within such time as the judge orders, not exceeding ten days after notice to him of such order, the judge shall remove him and appoint another in his place.

So if there is any practice on the part of sharp creditors to get possession of bankrupts' estates to the exclusion of the just rights of the bankrupt and his own creditors, the matter is in the charge of the judge. He can set aside an election made and order a new election, or appoint the assignee himself. That disposes of that objection.

In the second place, I wish to point out the objection raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, founded on the multiplication of officers, is precisely the reverse of what is the effect of this bill.

The assignee appointed by the creditors under this bill is a private trustee and not a public officer. The gentleman proposes to abolish the private trustees appointed in every case to manage the particular estate, and to substitute for private trustees an army of public officers, to be called official assignees, in every county and in every State of the United States. The effect of the amendment proposed is to reverse the objection of the gentleman from New York. Where an assignee is appointed under the bill as it now stands, he is in point of law and fact a private trustee for the management of a particular estate. He has nothing to do with any other estate. He is like a trustee appointed under a settlement or a trustee appointed under any system of writing to do a particular thing. His attention is confined to that thing and the faithful performance of that duty. The amendment of the gentleman from New York is to alter all that, and to make what is now a trust into an office, and make what is now a trustee into a public officer.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman whether he calls these trustees or assignees, if it be not true that the amendment proposes only one such officer, while the bill proposes as many such officers as there may be estates of bankrupts to be adjudicated on? That is the first question which I wish to ask the gentleman.

Mr. THAYER. Let me answer that before you ask another. I will answer the gentleman's questions as he goes along, one at a time. I answer the question which he has just asked by saying that the position of a trustee of a bankrupt's estate who is selected by the creditors is in no respect analogous to the position of a public officer.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLEY. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this amendment will not prevail. It seems to me this is a very plain matter. The gentleman proposes the appointment of official assignees, and complains that this bill provides for an army of office-holders. That seems to be his chief objection on that point. I agree fully with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] that the amendment of the gentleman from New York itself increases rather than diminishes the number of office-holders. Every official assignee which the amendment proposes is an office-holder, but no assignees which this bill proposes to appoint are office-holders in any true sense. They are merely custodians of the property of these creditors and these debtors.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this provision has worked admirably in practice in the State of Massachusetts. We have had a bankrupt law there for many years, which I believe it is acknowledged by all who have studied the subject is a better bankrupt law than has ever before been devised in this country or in Europe.

Most of the features of this bill have been taken from the Massachusetts law, and there is no feature in the bill that commends it more to my judgment and approbation than this very feature that is now opposed by the gentleman from New York. What is the appointment of these messengers? Is it the creation of office-holders? Not exactly in a proper sense. It is simply the appointment of individuals to take charge of this property during the intervening time between the petition being presented to the courts and the appointment of the assignee. And that difficulty cannot be obviated in any possible manner, except by the appointment of official assignees who shall first take possession of the property. I suppose the gentleman from New York will concede that.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman state whether he has read the section he is speaking upon?

Mr. ALLEY. I have.

Mr. CONKLING. I could not suppose you had when you said these marshals were not public officers—marshals of the United States.

Mr. ALLEY. I was speaking of assignees if I said marshals. These marshals are merely to take possession of the property. In our State they are messengers simply. But these marshals that this bill provides, who are to take possession of the estate, simply act as custodians of the property merely for a few days, and are what we call messengers. They have not the slightest jurisdiction over the property of the creditors, so far as making any disposition of it is concerned.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I would inquire of the gentleman whether in the law of Massachusetts there is such a provision as this:

There shall be excepted from the operation of this section necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles necessary to such bankrupt as the said assignee shall designate and set apart.

Mr. JENCKES. That is another subject—another section.

Mr. THAYER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike out the second line.

I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from New York, that I do not think he intends to mislead the House when he says that in certain cases two of the creditors may appoint an assignee. When two make the assignee they would represent a majority in value of the creditors. Is it not so?

Mr. CONKLING. Very likely; I do not know how it is; I said nothing to the contrary.

Mr. SPALDING. Under any circumstances it would be a majority of the property that would create the assignee. That is the intention. Now, I only wish to remark in addition; that I do consider this as one of the most valuable features of this whole scheme, which is so ably compiled by the gentleman from Rhode Island. I was conversant with the workings of the old act of 1842, and I know that nothing about it was more objectionable to the people than these county assignees. They felt no interest for those who really owned the property. Now, here the trustees are to hold and manage it for the interest of the creditors and subject to their ratification. And I appeal to the good sense of this House if this is not a fairer way of treating them than by putting it into the hands of county assignees, men appointed by this court. This bill proposes that the individual estate in insolvency shall pass into the hands of men who have an interest in protecting it.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. McINDOE. If the gentleman will give way, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I will yield for that purpose.

MORNING HOUR OF TUESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there will be no legislative session till next Tuesday. On Monday morning, however, the House will meet and the Journal will be read, but there will be but a very few moments for proceeding in the morning. The Chair will suggest, therefore, whether Tuesday shall not be considered the same as Monday, and whether the House shall not then go on with the morning hour as if it were Monday.

Mr. HALE. I move that the morning hour of Tuesday be considered the same as that of Monday.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. McINDOE. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 10, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. No business is in order in the House to-day except debate as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ECKLEY. I would inquire if an order has been made for an adjournment until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. It has not, because the House must be in session on Monday morning in accordance with the programme of the joint committee.

Mr. PAINE. I would inquire of the Chair if the order of the House permits the filing of petitions to-day?

The SPEAKER. It does; they may be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. ECKLEY. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I should not thrust myself upon the attention of the House at this time, could I with justice to myself remain silent.

So varied and novel are the schemes of reconstruction and the resolutions upon that subject that are crowded through the House without opportunity for debate, under the operation of the "previous question," that it seems necessary for members who desire their true position understood upon this vexed question to take the opportunity offered for the discussion of the President's message to do so.

After so many great minds, at both ends of this Capitol, have exhausted so thoroughly all views and phases of this question, it will not be expected that I will advance anything new. I shall only express the earnest, deeply fixed convictions of one of the humblest upon this floor, and you will receive them simply as such. Who can but tremble at the vast responsibility to our country, our countrymen, and to God, under which we rest as members of this Congress?

Never before in the history of nations has a legislative body met charged with such duties and obligations as have been imposed upon us. We are legislating for the present and the future. The effect of our action will not be circumscribed by our time and country alone; it will reach the whole earth and the remotest generation.

Ten million people, emerging from the chaos of war, stand before us powerless, disarmed, without government, without law, save from the strong arm of the military power, awaiting our action, demanding from us the full exercise of the rights they enjoyed in the better days gone by, when, true to the Union, they stood side by side with us in upholding the honor of our common flag. What have they done? Why are they knocking thus at the doors of our national councils? Why these vacant seats? Ah! they have committed the most fearful and gigantic crime known in the records of time.

They conspired to overthrow and blot from the book of nations the Government of their fathers, under whose protecting power they had grown rich, powerful, and enjoyed every blessing, without cause, save the desire to perpetuate human bondage. They conspired against popular rights and liberty. They sought to dishonor and degrade labor.

Governors, Legislatures, judges, municipal officers; the whole machinery of government, State and local; all collective and individual action of the people, were directed with awful power for long and terrible years for the destruction of this Republic.

In the cabinet, on the field, on the ocean, in foreign climes and capitals, with armed men, with the torch, with poison, with fire, by robbery, arson, murder, starvation, pillage, and all the crimes that a fiendish ingenuity could devise and put into execution, they pursued their work of death.

They declared the Union was dissolved, its mission ended, and that never while they lived on earth, while the last man could grasp the last musket, would they yield this pretension. And well they did their infernal work. They stand before God and man staggering under the murder of three hundred thousand of the noblest men that ever went forth to battle and to death. They have desolated and darkened every home in the land; $3,000,000,000 of national debt, $500,000,000 more obligations incurred by States and counties; two million men have shouldered arms for the Republic; one hundred and three thousand pensions upon our bounty caused by the war. These are some of the results of their action. They failed. Such men as were gathered into hosts and marched to the music of the Union and swept the armies of treason from the land were never before given to any country. How we should prize and cherish those who live, bind up their wounds, give them of our substance in their time of need. And those who died, whose precious dust reposes in the soil of every State, let us remember and sanctify their resting-places, and guard well their widows and orphans as the nation's treasure.

What is the condition of those States and people? What their relations to the General Government? What shall we do with them?

And now, without resentment or fear or looking backward or trimming our sails to catch some popular breeze, acting under our oaths, and with the desire only to do right as it is given us to "see the right," let us enter upon the consideration of these momentous questions.

All sovereignty rests with people in this country; by virtue of this sovereignty they have organized States and State governments, and been received as such States into the Union; and subject to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress made in pursuance thereof, each State, as long as the people thereof have observed their allegiance to the General Government, has been free and independent.

The legal union of the States cannot be broken by the action of the people of any State unless it is accomplished by successful rebellion. The rebellion failed, and therefore all the people who have upheld the Union and still control its Government can insist that the Union is not dissolved, and that territorially the States in rebellion still exist. Sovereignty is still inherent in the people of those States, to be exercised whenever in the judgment of the Government they can do so consistent with the national safety. I do not recognize any authority now existing in these States to represent this sovereignty or to carry out the powers which a loyal people instituting loyal State governments and sending loyal members to Congress can do, for the reason that the authorities and people of those States went into the rebellion, as I have stated, together with their Representatives in Congress who withdrew from these Halls for that purpose.

Their right to a new State government, to resume their practical and original relations with the loyal States, undoubtedly exists under certain conditions and restrictions. It seems to me that it necessarily follows from the relation of Government and people, which is of allegiance on the one hand and protection on the other, that if a portion of the people refuse their allegiance to the Government and make war upon it for its destruction, and are defeated in the attempt, they have forfeited the right of protection and are at the mercy of the Government. I said they were entitled to resume their original relations under certain conditions and restrictions. Who is to be the judge of those conditions and what they shall be? Shall the red-handed traitor be the judge? Is he to prescribe the conditions of his own return. No one will contend that. The whole practice of our Government under the last Administration and the present has been against it.

Shall foreign nations be the judge? No, thank God, in our darkest hour our Government resented even the advice of some of those nations as offensive and impertinent. And now we stand magnificent and peerless among the nations which of them shall thrust its judgment upon us? Will the autocrat of France? We say to him that if his intermeddling with affairs on this continent in defiance of the time-honored policy of this country does not cease, the army of blue will again be in motion and Maximilian will be hurled from the throne of the Montezumas.

I shall not perplex myself with abstract propositions or enter into any discussion as to whether the rebel States are in the Union or out of it. No one contends that they have legally severed their connection with the Union. The territorial boundaries of the States still exist; we have the right still to compel their obedience to the Government; they owe allegiance to no other; but as Mr. Lincoln, in his great good sense, in a speech made a few days before his assassination, says:

"They are out of their practical relation with the Union."

Practically, they have been out of the Union, and practically in feeling and sympathy they are out still; and ours shall be the task to bring them back, not simply to power without Union, but so to reconstruct as to secure a true Union with power. And while a State, considered as simply a legal institution, cannot be destroyed, still its government can be overturned and its members and people go into treason, so that practically it is destroyed; for after all—

"What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlements, or labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness waits perfumes to pride—
No! men, high-minded men," not traitors.

Where do you get your constitutional power to keep their Representatives from Congress; to organize military tribunals over them; suspend their courts, their Legislatures, their State functions? Ask gentlemen on the Democratic side—you are revolutionary, say they. The land groans under your despotism, they exclaim. These terrible assertions would alarm us did we not "consider the source." These same persons and their party said, when treason's gripe was at the nation's throat, and its guns commanded this capital, and our Government was trembling in the balance, "Oh! you cannot coerce a State!" "You must not make arbitrary arrests!" "You cannot make your Government credits legal tender!" "You cannot legally draft men into the Army; you are revolutionary; you disregard the Constitution." They said the war was a failure, at Chicago; they were the first after the war to grasp hands all red with the blood of our slain brothers; and now they are in these Halls still harping on the subject.

They had not long since the Democratic party with three quarters of the States; and year by year and one by one the people thrust them out as false prophets and guides; and now they have not a State (except a few reconstructed rebel ones in the South) that they can control; and here they are, a lean and hungry band of thirty-five or forty, uttering their notes of discord as ever, and now "crooking the pregnant hinges of the knee" to President Johnson, "that thrift may follow fawning." And they, thus repudiated and disowned, are still repeating their old cry of unconstitutionality. I say to them that they learn nothing by experience, nothing from history, or they would have seen ere this the "handwriting upon the wall," and read their own fate in that of the Tories of the Revolution and the Federalists of 1812. They assume to be the special champions of the President, whom not long ago they denounced a "usurper" and "tyrant." Do they think the President anxious to share their fate, to go down with them to a political death from which there will be no resurrection? No, gentlemen; be admonished; the President understands you as he did when the southern wing of your party drove him a refugee from his home and hunted him like a wild beast.

Had your counsel been followed in time of war the nation would have perished. The people will not listen to you now. When the difficult work of reconstruction is to be done, they will follow the earnest men who have brought them safely through the night now the morning is breaking. Call them radicals, call them revolutionists, denounce the reconstruction committee ordered by Congress as you denounced Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, and the "mercenary soldiery" that scared your rebel friends and rested like nightmares upon your copperhead slumbers, and yet the nation will come up to the great work, Congress will do its whole duty unawed by fear, unseduced by favor. The people will sustain that Congress in taking all the time necessary to reconstruct our Union on the foundations of immutable justice and equity to all classes and races under this broad flag, and woe to him, high or low, that stands in the way of it.

But I answer you that the Constitution does not provide for its own destruction; it was not so framed as to exclude all things that were needed for its own perpetuity. It provides for putting down rebellion, for the punishment of treason, for securing republican governments to the States; for rules and regulations to govern the Territories and other property of the United States; for raising armies and navies, and for the common defense. These are the grand objects of the Constitution; anything necessary to be done to carry out these objects is constitutional. It is constitutional to do all things necessary to preserve the Constitution and the nation which it founded.

It was constitutional to put down the rebellion; so it is constitutional to do all to prevent a return of rebellion—to provide for the future security of the nation.

You cannot invoke precedents in history to control our action; the situation is new. As there never was such a framework of government—such a people, such a rebellion, such traitors to deal with—we have consequently no guides in the past to illumine our pathway in the future. We must do what is necessary, relying upon our own judgment and sense of duty to complete the work begun in the field; for I say to you we are still combatting our old enemy in another form.

Again, the rights we now claim to exercise spring from the war power which is inherent in all Governments. When civil governments fail to secure obedience to the Constitution and laws, resort is had to the military power, and military governments are established such as Tennessee possessed under Governor (now President) Johnson, and other States have had during the rebellion; and, since the disloyal armies were overthrown, the war power has still been exercised, and its exercise is still needed in those States. The President has insisted that they should ratify the constitutional amendment, give the freedman a standing in court as witness and party, and that they should repudiate the rebel debt before he would remit them to their civil rights, or advise the reception of their members by Congress. How can this extraordinary executive power be justified except upon the principles I have adverted to?

The only question remaining is, when are these former rebels to be admitted to a share in the Government? That will depend much upon their loyalty and the ability they manifest to take loyal part in the Government.

Thirty years the rebellion was hatching. Have all its teachings gone in nine months? Four years it fought with a desperation worthy of a better cause. Are its resentments, its pride forgotten? The same ministers that preached treason, the same presses that proclaimed it, now lead the people and control their opinions.

It must be remembered that these people are now on their good behavior. Everything that is printed, said, or done is with reference to their getting back into the Government as soon as possible, and so the cloven foot is hidden as much as possible.

But truth will assert itself in spite of all these precautions; facts crop out proving beyond all doubt their continued disloyalty.

Shouts are given for Lee in the loyal Legislature of Virginia. A former member of the rebel congress, once a Speaker of this House, whose lips are steeped in violated constitutional oaths, is elected Governor of South Carolina. Loyal Alabama has a rebel general for Governor.

"Whipped, but not conquered."—Jackson (Mississippi) Free Trader.

"The title of rebel is a proud one."—Petersburg (Virginia) Daily News.

"The southern people have not been guilty of any crime; they have only failed," says a leading southern divine.

"We have a right to elect our military heroes to office. Ought we to give up our cherished notions of policy to swallow a plum?"—Macon (Georgia) Journal.

"We vote for the late confederate soldiers because they represent the valor, honor, and intelligence of the people."—The South Carolinian.

The Richmond Republic thus illustrates the southern idea of loyalty:

"The other day two young men were talking on a street in a city. They were diving deeply into fundamental principles. One of them asked the other what loyalty was. Ideas have been so unsettled about what it really consists in that an answer did not come very readily to the respondent. After some deliberation and an anxious, puzzled expression of countenance, the other's face suddenly brightened up. 'Why,' says he, 'I'll tell you exactly what it is: it is swearing to a lie.' Did or did not this young man, in the candid impulse of youth, speak the popular sentiment, or describe in a few words the sort of loyalty which is manifested around us?"

See what the Memphis Argus said of Union men during the rebellion:

"The Daily Memphis Argus of December 2, 1861, contained a paragraph headed 'Hang 'em,' and commencing—

"'Hang 'em! yes, hang them every one! Every East Tennessean, every Tennessean found recreant to the will and interest of the State of Tennessee, and known to be actively contriving with its enemies, should be hung, and loyally.'"

See what the Memphis Appeal says now:

"The confederacy is gone, and while we hold in sacred reverence its glorious memories, and treasure in our heart of hearts those "few in Sardis who did not defile their garments," those noble breed of men and women who showed most true metal the greater the sacrifices they were called upon to make, and who to the last gave an unreserved allegiance to their country, drinking

"Love in each life-drop that flowed from her breast," we, bitter rebels as we have been, can give the charity of silence to

"The slave
Whose treason like a deadly blight
Crept o'er the councils of the brave
To blast them in their hour of might."

"Yes, we can give him or her the charity of silence. If he sees fit to live in and seek a competence in the land he has betrayed, why let him eat the bitter bread of remorse in peace, and be assured that if a single element of a man remains within him, that bread will indeed be bitter."

Tennessee loyalists begging to have the military retained for the protection of loyal men, and saying that the rebels there are as cruel, malignant, and insolent as ever! This is indorsed by their Governor, the dauntless Brownlow. What do you think of reconstructed Tennessee?

Five hundred loyalists from the mountain fastnesses of Alabama say the same of that State. "They talk of insurrectionary violence yet in Alabama," says Major General Swayne.

The New Era, a loyal paper, published in Arkansas, sums up the whole situation thus:

"Arkansas, as she stands before the country now, can never be admitted upon a footing of equality with the loyal States, and we fervently trust never will until loyalty shall be supreme in the State. Arkansas is no worse than other insurrectionary States; on the contrary, she contains a considerable loyal element of the conservative stripe. But that element is even now in danger, if it has not already done so, of losing the prestige it so far possessed. Certain it is that when once admitted on the floor of Congress, and the military protection of the United States removed, the late disloyal element, which is as much opposed to republican principles as ever, and vastly superior to the loyal element, not only in numbers but brains, organization, wealth, and everything to make a partly successful, will make short work of the present State government, laws, and ordinances.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty": the rebels are seeking to gain by the ballot what they could not gain by the bullet. Congress alone stands between the reestablishment of the power of the old slave oligarchy and the triumph of republican and radical Union principles.

"God grant that Congress remain firm and not abandon the principles for the especial vindication of which the Almighty seems to have raised up this nation."

This is but a type of the whole.

General Grant is sometimes cited as an authority to show that the South is pacified, trustworthy, and loyal. If so he has a queer way of showing it. See what he says in answer to an application from Governor Parsons, of Alabama, for withdrawing the military from that State:

"For the present, and until there is full security for equitably maintaining the rights and safety of all classes of citizens in the States lately in rebellion, I would not recommend the withdrawal of the United States troops from thence. The number of interior garrisons might be reduced, but a movable force sufficient to insure tranquillity should be retained. While such a force is retained in the South I doubt the propriety of putting arms in the hands of the militia."

And I might multiply these terrible proofs to any extent. Do you need any more evidence that the "leopard has not changed his spots?" If so, peruse carefully the official report of General Carl Schurz. He found no loyalty there, only bold, defiant treason.

In not a single southern State have they done justice by the freedmen. In not one have they passed just and equitable laws that will protect him in his rights. The courts are rebel, jurors rebel, Legislatures rebel; the men who fought our flag boast of scars won in behalf of treason as honorable, and receive in reward office, honor, and profit. They do not disguise their hate for Union men; who are excluded from all those honors and privileges because of their loyalty. Freedom of speech, as of old, is a mockery. In the name of God, is such a people entitled to representation on this floor? Are you ready to receive them back now, to make laws for the widow whose husband they have slain; for the orphan whose sire they have murdered; for the maimed and helpless soldier whom they have robbed of arms or legs or eyes, and left him to drag out a miserable life? Is he to be a pensioner upon their bounty? Are you ready now to leave without protection the loyal men of the South both white and black, and hand over the whole power of your Government in those States to their enemies and oppressors? Who are these loyal white men of the South? They who fled to the mountains and the caves; who worshipped the old flag, though it trailed in the dust, with more than eastern idolatry; who suffered loss of home, family, property, all but death itself, for their country.

And the four million black men who were the slaves and under the control of the rebels, who were away from the Union lines and its protection, who only knew God because they saw Him in the stars and heard Him in the winds—for the Bible to them was a forbidden book—they who had only known the flag from the stripes it gave them and the Union from the chains it bound them with; they who from the first sent their morning and evening prayers to Heaven that the nation might live, who furnished our soldiers flying from captivity and death with guide and shelter, food and fire, while the master let slip bloodhounds on the fugitive's track; who of the four millions betrayed a loyal man? Not one who but exposed the traitor master. This faithfulness on the part of those poor, simple, ignorant men is to my mind one of the grandest phases that the war has developed.

How strange the contrast between the slave in his chains and the master who had been pampered by the Government. The former kissed and upheld the rod that had smitten him, the latter smote the hand that had fed him. And yet we are asked at this time to consign these loyal men, both white and black, to the mercy, as I have said, of these rebels and enemies.

I am free to say, Mr. Speaker, that if such is to be the policy of this Government it is all recreant to its high duty; it is unworthy of all the blood shed and treasure expended in its cause; it deserves to perish in its ingratitude and be blotted from the face of the earth.

We are told, sir, that they have ratified the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. Ay, so they have; but their courts have sold the freedmen into slavery the next day under some pretense of punishing him for vagrancy or something else equally absurd.

You say that they have repudiated the rebel debt. Indeed they have, in form; but how long do you suppose it will be after they get their members back into Congress before they will repeal all such legislation? They will have the power to do so; do you doubt their will? Have they done another thing more important; have they given us any assurance that they in conjunction with their obsequious northern allies will not repudiate the national debt, which they say was incurred in their subjugation?

You say that they have given the colored man a standing in court. Ay, so had Robert Emmett before his English murderers! So had the early martyrs in councils convened to take their lives! So had Jesus of Nazareth in the court of Pilate! A standing in court, with, as I have said, hostile judges, jurors, witnesses, church and state all hostile. Such a standing in court is mockery; it is worse, it is insult.

But we are told that these are "honorable men," and will live up to the oaths they have taken. "Honorable men" who butchered helpless women and crushed out the brains of little children at Lawrence, who murdered in cold blood prisoners of war at Fort Pillow, who stood by with infernal malice and saw the flesh shrink month by month, week by week, day by day from the bones of thirty thousand as brave and noble men as ever went forth to save a nation, until their strong frames tottered, their eyes grew dim, and suffering all the tortures of the damned, gnashed their teeth and wailed for food until the mind went wandering back to home and wife, mother and child, and they called on sacred names and laughed the maniac's laugh, and then moaned and cried for bread, and died for want of food. In this land of plenty, in the land they had gone to save, on the slimy couch where vermin crawled, trampled into the wet earth or over the "dead line," in tatters, in rags, in awful stench and filth, with dead men in heaps around them, they died, and Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis, and all the rest of these "honorable men," stood by upholding the hellish deed. God save the nation from such "honorable men!"

"But what would you do?" says the impatient inquirer. "Are you not weary of war and blood? Are you not for peace and Union?" I am for peace and Union—that peace which will be lasting, that Union which will be just; for the fearful lesson of the last four years will be lost upon us if we have reconstruction without justice—justice to the loyal men, justice to the freedmen. We tolerated injustice to a race until it was wiped out by the blood of a million men. Let us reconstruct now upon solid foundations. We have the power and the right, and it is our highest duty to do so. We should convict and hang for treason the leaders of the rebellion, that all ambitious demagogues hereafter shall be admonished that "treason is a crime" to be punished. Justice, by constitutional amendment fixed beyond the mutations of southern legislation, would give to every class and race of men in those States equality before the law, and all the power and franchises necessary to secure that equality. Justice and a due regard to our national safety would take the government of those States from the hands of our country's enemies and place it in the hands of its friends; and if special legislation is needed to create for the future, as in the past, territorial governments for them to secure those ends, let it be done. And let not any indecent haste to strike hands that are red with our brothers' blood and put on garments that are reeking with the odors of rebel prison pens throw away the opportunity to enforce justice. Take all the needed time to settle these grave issues upon the eternal principles of right, build up the new structure on the rock of justice and equality, so that the waves of war and sedition may dash against it unharmed through all the ages that are to come.

We are the judges, I have said, of the conditions of their return to power.

Congress, the loyal Congress, is to decide who shall take seats here. Loyal men, I am told, have come here as representatives from some of those States; as such men I take them by the hand. But I would ask them, do you represent a loyal constituency? It is the constituency we are rejecting, not the man. I would ask them what guarantee they can give, that when their brief term here is ended, that men in sympathy with their rebellious districts, who can swear hard enough to take the oath, (for they are a nation of oath-takers and oath-breakers,) will not succeed them. They should remember that they were elected while the war was still raging, while these rebel constituents were in the field; now they have returned to vote at the next election, do they expect a re-election from their hands? Can they assure me that they were not put forward for the present by design, to use their loyalty to edge their districts into Congress, and then to be laid aside (as Governor Holden of North Carolina was) as a cast-off mask when the object is accomplished? Suppose we let them in now, what excuse can we give, having established this precedent, for excluding others?

I will yield to none in my regard for the Union men of the South, but I can do nothing to jeopardize the great question of the time. I cannot sacrifice principle in my partiality for men. Congressmen and Presidents are but the objects of the day—

"That strut and fret their hour upon the stage,
And then are heard no more."

They pass away and are forgotten; but our acts here on these great questions will live forever, for the weal or woe of the Republic. We must make no mistakes, but build the edifice slowly and surely. And when the justice we have demanded is secured, the guarantees we ask for are given, and a returning Union sentiment is apparent, then we would lift no longer the veil of horrors, but consign to Heaven, that rights all wrongs, the guilty of our "misguided countrymen;" and united with the South we would seek to lift it up to a purer patriotism and to the level of the olden time, when together we fought the common foe, cherished common glories and traditions, and reposed beneath the folds of a common flag. And then our country will march on to its imperial destiny, the greatest and the best of all the nations of the earth.

Mr. DELANO next addressed the House. During his remarks his hour expired.

On motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, the time of Mr. DELANO was extended.

The SPEAKER. It was the understanding of the House on yesterday that there would be time for three speeches to-day by three o'clock. If there be no objection, the Chair will consider it proper to allow three speeches to be made, even should it extend the session till after three o'clock.

No objection was made.

Mr. DELANO then concluded his remarks, which will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, nearly two years ago, and while the war was flagrant, I felt it my duty as a member of this body to look into the question of the relations that had been produced by it, the privileges that had been forfeited on the one hand, and the rights and powers that had been acquired on the other, with a view to the readjustment of the whole machine by the restoration of those parts that had been sundered from it by the disturbance. With some, the infirm of faith, the inquiry was thought to be premature. This, however, was not the judgment of the last Congress. It passed a bill which did not meet the approval of the Executive because it interfered with a plan of his own that had not proved acceptable to it, and the question was adjourned without advice from that body, and in such a way as to leave the field open for experiments with which it was not in a condition to interfere.

The people are here again in the persons of their representatives who are the law-making power of the nation, not on invitation but by constitutional mandate, to inquire what has been attempted, and to decide for themselves what shall be done with the Territories that have been conquered by their arms. It is agreed on all hands that they shall be eventually readmitted as members of the common family. It is not pretended by anybody that they can resume their places here of their own mere volition and without any consent of ours. It is not insisted, I think, by any well-read statesman, that our power to exclude depends only on our right to determine upon the qualifications of our own members. It is confessed that there is an organic lesion that forbids their return, and can only be supplied by a new organization which no act of spontaneous generation can produce. It will scarcely be contended now, I suppose, as it was by an eccentric committee of the last House, that our victory was crowned only with a lapse of sovereignty, or that the jurisdiction to restore a lost member is anywhere but here. I shall be excused, of course, for returning to this subject under circumstances that not only invite but compel its discussion. If it was not proper for Congress to prescribe in advance the law that was to govern this question in the last resort, at all events, while other agencies, mistaking perhaps its backwardness for an abdication of its rightful powers, were industriously employed in forestalling its own action, it is no longer possible, in view of what has occurred since the last adjournment, and of the forces that have been mustered to overbear our deliberations here, to avoid a conflict that has been so long foreshadowed.

To determine this great question, the greatest by far that has ever challenged the deliberations of an American Congress, it is important to inquire, in the first place, what is the posture of these Territories as it has been affected by the progress and results of the war, which has just been determined by their enforced submission to the authority of the nation?

So far, at least, as armed resistance is concerned, it may be assumed that the war is at an end. The deluded communities that have so wantonly insulted this Government and defied its power now lie conquered, and helpless, and in social ruin at our feet, deprived, by their own act—I will not say, in the language of the proclamations that have been addressed to them, of "all civil government whatever," but certainly of all the organism that was essential to the maintenance of their old relations to the Union. To claim any more than this would be to assume a condition of anarchy where there is still a "supremelaw" under the Constitution, and where, even in the absence of such a rule, the territory reclaimed must necessarily pass under the jurisdiction and law of the conqueror. Taking it, however, to be true, as stated, then, by necessary inference, the civil law of the Union is dethroned, and its military power is all that remains to hold these States in subjection to our authority. In point of fact, we do so hold them now, except so far as they have been surrendered to the enemy, without other law than our own sovereign will. The supreme executive functionary of this nation, who, by virtue of his office, is the Commander-in-Chief of its armies, feeling that they were not in a condition to be trusted to themselves, instead of sheathing the sword, convolving the representatives of the people, advising them that these provinces were tranquillized, and submitting to them, as the law-making power, the grave question, what is to be done with them? has preferred to await the usual period of our assemblage, and appointed his lieutenants and proconsuls to govern them in the meanwhile with the aid of armies, and the terrors of that arbitrary code which is known by the name of martial law. We are here now, however, and it becomes our first duty to relieve that officer from this unusual and inappropriate task, and to furnish some security to the conquered people by the substitution of another and a gentler rule.

I would not be understood, however, as questioning the exercise of a sovereignty like this, so long as it was necessitated by the absence of a legislative power, since that is but a logical consequence of the position previously maintained by me on this floor, that these States had ceased to be members of the Union, and passed into the condition of Territories. If they continued to be States, within the meaning of the Constitution, the moment the resistance ceased it would have been the duty of the Executive to withdraw the armies, and they would have at once resumed their status quo ante, with all their constitutional rights and privileges unimpaired. If they were still States, all that has been done since, even though the power of Congress had been invoked to authorize it, would have been the clearest of usurpations. Taking them, however, to have been "deprived," in the language of the proclamations, "of all civil government whatever," it was but a legitimate inference of the Executive that they had not only forfeited their elective franchise, and lost their property in slaves, but placed themselves in a condition where they were no longer entitled even to the benefit of the constitutional guarantee without a new birth. The idea of any State, except that of nature, without any "civil government whatever," is as incomprehensible to me as that of a State being in the Union, or indeed anywhere, that is admitted to have no existence whatever.

No more would I be inclined to quarrel with those who, starting from these premises, are still disposed to insist that these States were never out. The difference is perhaps only the result of a want of precision in the use of terms, or a diversity of opinion in regard to their meaning. Mr. Burke has furnished us with a distinction here that meets the case precisely. "The word State," he remarks in his letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe, on the subject of the extension of the elective franchise to the Irish Catholics, "is one of much ambiguity. Sometimes it is used to signify the whole commonwealth, comprehending all its orders, with the several privileges belonging to each. Sometimes it signifies only the higher, and ruling part of the commonwealth, which is commonly called the government." In the former of these senses, it is not to be doubted that these communities still exist, and are in the Union, or of the Union, because their territories belong to it, and their people owe it allegiance. In the latter, however—and that is the one that connects them with our political system, as the proclamations concede—they are admitted by the same proclamations to have been destroyed, and can, of course, be nowhere. And this will be found to reconcile the apparent contradiction between the language of the proclamations and the accordant practice of the Government on the one hand, and the theory of those who are supposed to speak its opinions, and infer from some unhappy phraseology of the former, as well as from the more recent utterances of the message, the repugnant idea that there was a constitution of government left existing amid the general wreck, in a case where it had been previously declared in terms that there was "no civil government whatever."

There can be no real dispute, therefore, between the Executive and his northern friends as to the posture of these dilapidated members. Their entire treatment by him shows that they have only been regarded practically as conquered provinces. I deprecate, however, the encouragement that has been given to the enemies of the Government by the promulgation of the fallacious doctrine which has found so ready a currency among the disaffected of the North, and has proved so welcome to the unrepentant rebels of the South, that these disorganized States have never ceased to be members of the Federal Union. That is the present theory of every traitor, North or South, who has been insisting for four long years of war on the right as well as the fact of secession. With strong assurances of pardon, they can well afford to risk the consequences of treason by repudiating the belligerency upon which they have heretofore claimed immunity for their crime, if it will restore them to their original rights, and serve them as an argument against the legality of the proclamation that has stripped them of their property in slaves. Grant them the postulate that all their acts of secession were not a fact, but a nullity—that the crime which they committed was impossible, because it was forbidden—and if they cannot invalidate the war and the debt that was made by it, they will at least stagger your courts with the question, by what authority under the Constitution you have presumed to deprive the people of a State within the Union, by proclamation and without judgment of law, of any of their franchises or property. They will admit it now as an incident of the war—if there was a war, or could be where there was no secession, and therefore no belligerent—so far as the thing was consummated by an actual seizure, just as they are now ready to confess that the right of secession has been disproved by the logic of the sword, which means only by their present inability to maintain it by that argument, while their northern brethren still assert the very heresy upon which it rests. But once in, they will take you at your word, and insist that all your intermediate acts were nullities as well as theirs.

Agreeing, however, as we all do, that these States, without any local law or governments of their own, have passed under the law of the conqueror—and the attempt to reorganize them by Federal authority is an admission of it—the next question, into the discussion of which we are now prematurely hurried, is not how they are to be governed until they shall be in a condition to return—because that seems to have been assumed to be no business of ours—but whether that condition has been reached, and what are to be the agencies and terms through and upon which this consummation is to be effected.

If there be any one question that more than another falls within the exclusive cognizance of the people of the loyal States, and deserves and demands the thoughtful consideration of their Representatives, it is just this. Eleven of the columnar supports of our political edifice are now lying around us, like the giant columns of Tadmor and Palmyra, with shaft and capital and architrave alike shattered by the mighty convulsion that has laid them all in ruins. Where is the hand that is to lift these columns to their place? Who is it that shall reunite the dissevered fragments, and wreath the ivy over the towers that have been rent from turret to foundation? What are to be the process and the conditions on which these great criminals, who, "like the base Judean," have wantonly flung away "a pearl richer than all their tribe," are to be readmitted into the enjoyment of the privileges they have rejected and despised, and received again into the fellowship of the men they hated, and the confidence and honors of the Government they have only failed to destroy because it has proved too strong even for a degree of treachery that has no parallel in history? How far are these baffled parricides to be trusted again, now that they are vanquished, and without power of resistance, after such an experience, after so bloody a lesson as they have taught us, and what are the guards that will be required to prevent a recurrence of any of the evils from which we have just escaped? All these are problems which, however simple they may have been considered in some quarters, might well embarrass the profoundest of our statesmen, and which all the collective wisdom of the nation will not be more than sufficient to solve. The war itself, stupendous as it has proved, was nothing in the comparison. There never was a reasonable doubt as to the suppression of the rebellion, provided the loyal States should prove true to themselves. It was a purely arithmetical problem, of which the elements were within the reach of everybody. If all the slave States had been united, eighteen millions of northern freemen, with the credit and resources and prestige of this great Government on their side, and man for man the peers of their enemy, were sure to subdue less than one half their number, with four millions of a disaffected population in their midst, as soon as they were allowed to strike at the heart of the rebellion, and it came to be understood that it was to be a war à l'outrance. The only real danger was in the prospective and inevitable process of reconstruction. It was a question only whether there would be wisdom enough in the councils of the nation to profit by the heroism of our soldiers in the field, or folly enough to throw away the fruits of the many sacrifices that this long and bloody war had cost us, by ignoring our past experience, and rushing with headlong precipitation and immature resolve into measures of restoration, resting on no system or principle, and reserving no guarantees for the future. We have just reached that point. The rebellion, so far, at all events, as armed resistance is concerned, is over. We still tread, however, on the ashes of an unextinguished volcano—"supposito cinere doloso." "An earthquake's spoils are sepulchered below." The ground still heaves and trembles; the fiery flood still surges and pulsates beneath our feet; and already, almost before the thunders of our artillery have rolled into the distance, and while the smoke of battle is still upon the plain—without a moment's pause to survey the wide field of ruin, and reach forward, if possible, with telescopic vision into all the bearings and all the remotest possible consequences of the act which we are called upon to do, a childish impatience is urging us upon a path where angels might fear to tread, and expecting us to crowd the structure of an empire—the ordinary work of centuries—into the deliberations of an hour.

Upon considerations such as these I would have preferred to wait until the two Houses, acting in their legislative capacities, and in the spirit of statesmen who are charged with the interests of half a continent, had matured some plan which would secure uniformity in our proceedings here, while it furnished to the whole country—to the loyal people of the returning States as well as to ourselves—all the safeguards which the circumstances of the case required. My judgment is that you can proceed lawfully in no other way. If restoration is the object;

if these State governments have been destroyed and must be organized anew; if the people of these States must be enabled to restore them to their old relations and put them in a way to entitle them to claim the benefits of the constitutional guarantee through the agency of the Federal authorities; if they must be readmitted; if the guarantee is to be fulfilled—all which things are conceded by the proclamations—then it is as clear as sunlight that nothing short of an act of Congress, a law in all its constitutional forms, can accomplish this work. But I am in no hurry even as to this. Festina lente is the motto for a statesman. States are of slow growth. A century is but a day in the life of a nation. A great poet has said—

"A thousand years scarce serve to form a State;
An hour may lay it in the dust."

To heal the wounds inflicted by a four years' civil war is not the work of a day. If we would do it well we must imitate the processes of nature, beginning at the bottom and working slowly to the surface. Sound statesmanship would declare in favor of this course in any case. It would tolerate no other where there is so little excuse for precipitancy, where there is no real pressure except that which is invited by ourselves, and where a mistake once made, however disastrous in its effects, would be absolutely irremediable. That privilege is, however, denied to us. Though we had declined to court this issue by going out to meet it, it has come to seek us here, and if we have not been allowed to provide by law, in advance of the occasion, a rule which shall govern all cases, we must at least meet it in the more questionable shape in which it presents itself, though under disadvantages not unlike those we had to encounter with the same parties at the beginning of the war.

The present Executive of the nation, acting upon the prevalent idea that it is the duty of the Government to take the initiative step in the process of restoration, instead of awaiting any spontaneous action or the expression of any desire on the part of the people of the rebel States to return to their original relations in the Union—which could be only properly conveyed by an appeal to Congress—has, in the recess of this body, and on the cessation of active hostilities in these States, concluded it to be his duty to direct their organization, along with the process by which it is to be effected, in order to entitle them to the benefit of the constitutional guarantee, and has accordingly indicated his plan in a series of proclamations, which are all of the like tenor, though differing in some respects from the plan of his predecessor. The presumption was that they would in all instances conform to the law that he had prescribed for them. Having so complied, they would naturally expect that their immediate lawgiver, although then understood to admit the ultimate decision to rest with Congress alone, would recommend their admission, and enforce that recommendation with all the influence that he could lawfully exert. It becomes important, therefore, to look into that process, and ascertain whether it was consistent with the spirit of our institutions; whether it rested on any correct view of the relations with which it had to deal; and how far it was calculated to secure the object for which it was professedly contrived.

These proclamations all recite and rest upon the constitutional obligation to guaranty to all these States a republican form of government. They do not declare the war to be at an end, but the contrary. They speak in the name and by the authority of the Commander-in-Chief, as well as the supreme civil executive magistrate of the United States. They assert that the rebellion has "in its revolutionary progress deprived the people of these States of all civil government whatever," and for the purpose of enabling the loyal people thereof to organize State governments, by virtue as well of the military as of the civil power vested in the Executive, commission sundry individuals as provisional governors for the occasion, with power to prescribe rules for the assemblage at the earliest practicable period of conventions of delegates, to be chosen by that part of the people which is loyal, for the purpose of altering and amending the constitutions thereof, and with authority, moreover, to exercise all the power necessary to enable such loyal people to restore said States to their constitutional relations with the Federal Government, and to present such forms of government as will entitle them to the guarantee of the United States, and their people therefore to protection against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence—with the proviso, however, that no person shall vote, or be eligible as a member, without having previously taken an oath to support the Constitution and Union of the United States, and all the laws and proclamations made during the rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves, and without having been duly qualified as an elector by the constitutions and laws of these States in force before the adoption of the so-called ordinances of secession. And they further enjoin upon the military commanders of the particular departments, and all officers or persons in the military and naval service, the duty of aiding and assisting the said provisional governors in carrying these proclamations into effect.

A careful analysis of these instruments will be found to result in the development of the following leading propositions:

1. They admit the continuing existence of a state of war, and profess to rest on the twofold authority of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, as well as supreme civil executive magistrate of the Union.

2. They declare the people of these States to have been deprived by their own acts of all civil government whatever.

3. They confess the necessity of a new organization for the purpose of restoring their constitutional relations with the Federal Government, and presenting such form of government as will entitle them to the benefit of its guarantees, and therein admit that they are not so entitled in their present condition.

4. They concede that the new organization must receive its impulse and direction from without, and be assisted by the coöperative action of the Federal authorities.

5. Confessing, however, that these States are not now entitled to the benefit of the constitutional guarantee, they assert, in effect, that under it the Federal Government is bound to place them in a position which will enable them to claim it, and assume that the fulfillment of that guarantee is a purely executive function, to be performed in such a way as the judgment of the President may determine.

6. They direct, accordingly, the assemblage of conventions at the earliest practicable day, and define and ascertain the qualifications of the voters.

7. In fixing these qualifications they adopt a standard that is entirely new, by limiting the franchise, not to the white men generally, but to such only of the people who were invested with that prerogative under the government that is admitted to have been destroyed as are loyal, and will swear to support, not the Constitution only, but all laws and proclamations during the rebellion having reference to the emancipation of slaves.

8. Admitting, moreover, that these States are without any civil government whatever, and that they must necessarily organize anew, they insist that it shall be done upon the partial recognition of a government that has been destroyed, by a process, not of organization at all, but of amendment and alteration only, that shall work simply on that part of the defunct corpus which was left untouched by the ordinances of secession, and whose continued existence would involve a denial of the right of Federal interference, and is in direct contradiction of the premises on which these proclamations rest.

9. They look, moreover, to the employment of the military arm in the execution and enforcement of the scheme of restoration which they involve.

With all proper respect for the Executive, I am constrained to say that there are evidences here, either that these proclamations could not have been considered or digested with the care which so great an occasion would seem to have demanded, or that the case might not unprofitably have been transferred from the other end of the avenue to its appropriate forum in the great council of the nation, assembled here to deliberate upon its interests, and vested exclusively with the high power of legislating in regard to its Territories, of admitting new States, and of fulfilling all constitutional guarantees. My reasons for so thinking will, however, be better understood from the remarks I have to offer on the several propositions which I have extracted from them.

It may be safely affirmed, I think, that the existence of a state of war, whether that war be openly aggressive and demonstrative in its character, or exhibiting itself only in sullen discontent or disaffection or hatred of the Government, such as to necessitate the presence of a military force to compel obedience to the national authority or to prevent a seizure of the local power, is utterly irreconcilable with the idea of such an organization as the genius of our institutions and the very texture of our Government would demand. Without the spontaneous and unrestrained volition of the majority of the people, I cannot conceive the idea of the existence or constitution of a republican State. A form of government erected by or for a minority of the people, and depending upon armies for its existence or support, would be the merest mockery of a republic, and could not be recognized here consistently with the terms of the constitutional guarantee. It is a self-evident proposition that so long as it requires an army or a Federal legate—whether called by the name of provisional governor, lieutenant, commandant, proconsul, or pretorian prefect—to govern it, it is not in a condition to perform that task itself; and the very appointment, which would be otherwise unlawful, is a confession of it. While the Executive holds the Territory within his grasp as the Commander-in-Chief of our armies, he holds it under military law—which is the only law he can administer—and by a power that is absolute; and it is idle to talk about the restoration of the civil authority by the voluntary act of the people themselves, because he is essentially supreme. The power he wields is above the law, and silences the law. There can be no two codes, no divided imperium here. The man who so rules is essentially a dictator; and it makes no difference in principle whether he prescribes the law for a good purpose or a bad one. It is impossible that the people should act freely under such a domination. It is only when it ceases that they can truly be regarded as their own masters. The jealousy of our fathers has guarded against the very presence of the military on the election ground, even where the civil law reigned, and the subordination of the military was unquestioned. Where it knows no law, however, except its own will, and stands by to direct and execute that will, the acts done, which would be clearly invalidated thereby in the States, are its own. If it assembles conventions and names the voters, they are its creatures. If it elects Congressmen, they represent it only. If the product of its imperial rescript is a republic in form, it is a republic engendered from the decomposing remains of the dead sovereignty, under the fierce embrace of the military power—a republic hatched into life by the spirit of despotism brooding over a chaos of ruin. To say that a monstrous birth like this, tearing its way through the entrails of the State—a delivery by the sword—assisted by the matronly offices of a provisional governor, and graced by a more than royal attendance in the high functionaries of State, “the military commandant of the department, and all officers and persons in the military and naval service,” who are expressly summoned to be present on the august occasion—is the legitimate offspring of a free people, or has any of the features of a republic within the meaning of the Constitution, is to draw largely on the imagination. Freedom recoils aghast at such an apparition, and shrieks out “death!” Nor will it be sufficient to assert that these sword-bearers were not actually present in the body, and that therefore no control was exercised over these provincial councils by their creator and lawgiver. We know that when the fiat went forth publicly to the hesitating synod of North Carolina that the debt of the rebellion must be repudiated, every knee went down in humble submission to the orders of the Commander-in-Chief. We know, too, from the very recent message of the rebel general and Governor of Mississippi, Humphreys, who was pardoned specially to qualify him for the place, that it was “under the pressure of Federal bayonets” that the people of that State “have abolished the institution of slavery;” and it is not uncharitable to infer that the members of all these bodies knew precisely how much would be expected of them, and were prepared to do the will of the Executive, even though it had extended to suffrage for the black man. Disguise it as we may, these so-called constitutions of government are but articles of capitulation after the fact; treaties between that officer, dealing with these questions as an absolute sovereign, and the chiefs of the rebellion; terms dictated by the President as a conqueror, in accordance with his own individual and imperial will; agreements reluctantly conceded by them, as the condition not only of pardon, but of restoration to power, but almost invariably repudiated by their followers in the refusal to ratify them by sending men here who were qualified under the laws of Congress to take their places amongst us. That they are so considered, even by themselves, is shown by the recent correspondence between the high contracting powers, represented by our Minister of Foreign Relations on the one hand and Governor Orr of South Carolina on the other, in which it is declared by the latter that the State convention, which he admits to be a revolutionary body, had been dissolved “after having done all that the President requested to be done.” It is shown, too, more strongly in the letter of the rebel General Hampton to the people of South Carolina, declining to be a candidate for Governor, on the ground that it might embarrass the Executive in his benevolent designs in favor of the South. Though not approving all that was conceded by the convention, he recommends their acquiescence in what he treats as the demands of the conqueror, on the ground of necessity, and for the special reason that the President “had exhibited a strong disposition not only to protect the South from the radicalism of the North, but to reinstate them in their civil and political rights.” “It may be assumed,” he adds, “that when the forms of government are restored, and freedom of speech allowed to us, your late convention will be subjected to harsh criticism, and its action impugned. Should such unhappily be the case, remember that you, the people of South Carolina, accepted the convention as part and parcel of the terms of your surrender. The President had no shadow of authority, I admit, under the Constitution of the United States to order a convention in this or any other State; but as a conqueror he had the right to offer, if not to dictate, terms. The terms offered by him you have accepted. I do not myself fully concur in all the measures adopted by the convention, but I shall cheerfully acquiesce in the action it took to carry out faithfully the terms agreed on. Entertaining these views, I think it our duty to sustain the President of the United States so long as he manifests a disposition to restore all our rights as a sovereign State. Above all, let us stand by our State. Her record is honorable, her escutcheon untarnished.” When a man like Hampton speaks of “the radicalism of the North,” we know that he intends the Union party of the free States, who favored the prosecution of the war and elected the President himself, and the men whom they have sent here to declare their will; and it is on the disposition of the President to protect them from his own friends in the country and in these Halls—the feeling that they could make a better bargain with him, and were safer in his hands than in those of the people and their Congress, that without one word in favor of the Union, but with an earnest invocation to the people to stand, above all things, by their own honorable and untarnished State, he urges them to support, not the Union, but the President, and him only “so long as he manifests a disposition to restore all their rights as a sovereign State,” including, of course, the transcendent and inalienable right of secession. And the Executive responds to this presentation of the case by informing us in his late message that we have nothing to do with the terms of settlement; while the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] who is supposed to reflect his opinions, is candid enough to put his vindication of the special requirements of that functionary on the same grounds, and in language almost identical with that of the traitor Hampton. It is a waste of time, however, to labor a point like this. If the orders of the Commanding General, as enunciated through the proclamations themselves were in point of fact obeyed, it is sufficient for the purposes of this argument. To deny his control over the creatures of his own will, because his subordinates did not stand over their deliberations with a drawn sword, would be the merest of subterfuges. As well might it be said that the Maker of all things, who launched the circumambient orbs through the immensity of space, and prescribed the law of gravitation for their government, was exercising no control, because He was not on sleepless watch at the center of the system, and telegraphing his special orders to Neptune and Uranus by way of keeping them on the track as they sped their unerring way through the mazy labyrinth of the stellar worlds.

It will be urged, however, as it has been, that this was a measure of peace; an instrumentality essential to the tranquillization of those States; a part of the process for the restoration of order that must precede the withdrawal of the national authority, and would enable the loyal people there to dispense with the further presence of its armies. The answer is, that if it was intended to place the reins in the hands of the loyal minority of white men, while it confesses a condition of things where a republic is impracticable and an election would be an absurdity, it could insure no peace and no permanent ascendancy to that element without continued protection, because it required a military power to inaugurate it, just as is now admitted by Governor Brownlow to be the case in Tennessee; and if it was intended merely to restore the disloyal majority who governed before the rebellion and hurried these States into it, then it was unnecessary. The idea is, in plain English, if not to make them our masters, at least to free them from our authority in the first place, in the hope that it will secure peace and submission in the future. I cannot consent to any such arrangement. I do not comprehend the value of that tranquillity which is only to be purchased by the abdication of our power, whether it be by the withdrawal of our troops, the restoration to the enemy of the arms that he was compelled to lay down on the last of his battle-fields, or the invitation—I should rather say command—to him to share our counsels in the adjustment of the results and the responsibilities of the war. If this be peace, it might have been secured at any time, with only the waiver of our right to insist that they shall sit down on the judgment seat and divide the empire with us. It may be secured now by allowing them to resume their power and places here upon the cheap consideration of a temporary acknowledgment that the negro is no longer an article of merchandise, because all their chances of success in this rebellion now depend on a change of weapons and the retransfer of the theater of war to the arena where it began. I say in this rebellion, because I am not sanguine enough to consider it at an end, as a very recent opinion of the Attorney General transmitted by the President, admits it is not. There are those, I know, who cannot comprehend a state of war unless it comes home to their grosser senses in the rude shock of battalions and the groans of the wounded and the dying, and think, therefore, when the standard drops from the nerveless grasp, that this is peace. It is to form a very inadequate conception of a kind of arbitrament that depends as much on skillful tactics as on hard knocks. Resistance does not always cease when its arms are stricken from its hands. The victory is not always to the strong. It is as often the guerdon to the wise. True, we have conquered these people in battle, but what of that? No man was ever converted from an enemy into a friend by the summary logic of shot and shell.

"Who overcomes

By force, hath overcome but half his foe."

The demoniac spirit that animated this rebellion, the same that mutilated and starved and butchered our martyred heroes, that inoculated the veins and rotted off the strong arm of the northern warrior with the deadly venom of the lazarus-house, that baled the yellow fever as merchandise for this capital, and that ended by assassinating our President, still lives, unrepentant, unsubdued, ferocious, and devilish as ever. The battle still rages, as it did in these Halls long before the outbreak of the rebellion, but under a new phase.

"What though the field be lost?

All is not lost."

If arms have failed, there are other weapons, rejected by the South in its blind and unreasoning arrogance, which have proved in other times more potent in its hands than the puny sword that has just been shattered like a potsherd in its collision with the iron muscle of the sinewy laboring man of the free States. A bloody experience has taught them their mistake in crossing swords with the soldiers of the North instead of fighting the battle in the Union, and relying on the folly of its statesmen and the superior address that harnessed its fierce democracy to their triumphal car and made them the masters of the nation until the period of their revolt. Hurling to the earth like their great prototypes in crime, how natural to find the like consolation in the reflection:

"Henceforth their might we know, and know our own:

So as not either to provoke, or dread
New war provoked; our better part remains
To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
What force effected not."

But this is not the peace that we have been endeavoring to secure. This is not victory, but defeat—just such defeat as that which follows the astounding paradox that our supposed triumph on the Appomattox, that made every heart leap with joy, has only purged the guilt of our enemies and reinstated them here with no right impaired, to "beard us in our hall" and "push us from our stools." There is nothing, therefore, in the argument to drive us into such an inversion of the natural and logical order as would be involved in the imposition of State governments by the military arm, any more than there is to hurry us into a premature and ill-adjusted scheme of restoration, when there is abundant leisure to arrange our plans, and a false step would be irrevocable. I want a real peace before reorganization and readmission here. Invert the order, and we shall have no peace. It will only amount, as I have before hinted, to a change of weapons, and a retransfer of the seat of war to these Chambers, whence they went out four years ago to try the bloody issue that has been determined against them, just as they had before gone out in couples to seek the blood of some northern Representative.

And now, as to the admission that the people of the seceding States have been deprived of all civil government whatever.

During the last Congress, as I have already remarked, I took some pains to show that these States were, by construction of law as well as in point of fact, outside of the Union, because it was apparent that the whole question of our power to deal with them in such a way as to realize the legitimate results of the war and exact the necessary securities for our future peace, must depend on the relation in which the war had left them. The phraseology, though sufficiently precise, was not perhaps as well chosen as it might have been to exclude the idea either that they were out rightfully as States, or out in point of fact territorially. The "rari nantes," the few citizens of those States who, though outlawed by the belligerent relation recognized by our courts, as well as by the whole conduct of the war, and positively established by our legislation here, still remained "faithful among the faithless" would naturally protest against a form of expression that seemed to shut them out from the relation of citizens, and to give them the character of alien enemies; and it is perhaps, therefore, no great matter of surprise that the doctrine should have found so little favor in high places. I do not care to reargue that question now, because it is perhaps not material. Taking the word State as contradistinguished from that of Government—for which there is unquestionably an example and a warrant in the language of the constitutional clause of guarantee—to mean, as it has been defined by so great an authority as Mr. Burke, "the commonwealth at large, with all its orders and all the rights belonging to each," and not "the ruling or governing power," it may be admitted without damage to the argument that they are still in. In that aspect of the case it must signify the territory, or the people, whether black or white, loyal or disloyal, or both. It cannot be the territory only, because it would then continue to be a State, although deprived of its inhabitants as well as of its government, in which case it was never pretended that it was out. It cannot mean the people only, because that would make them a State, though all disclaiming their allegiance, or all alien enemies, and owing none except such as was qualified, and temporary, and purely domiciliary. In this sense it is a compound idea, of which one of the elements is necessarily a loyal people, and a perception of which is discernible in the fact that under the plan of the proclamations the voters are to be confined to the loyal, or at least that portion of them which has the accidental advantage of having straighter hair or somewhat whiter skins than the residue.

It is enough for my purpose, however, that their political organizations, through which only they can maintain their appropriate relations to our governmental system, have been, as it is admitted they are, entirely destroyed; a point which could not be well contested in view of the common-law rules that govern in cases of public or municipal as of merely private corporations. The proclamations go further in affirming that they have been "deprived of all civil government whatever," which would imply a state of anarchy, and ignore alike the law of conquest and "the supreme law" under the Constitution, and thus exude them from the Union by a strict logical necessity. By this, however, the President intends, no doubt, the local governments alone. He cannot affirm a condition of anarchy, as this would be, so long as he maintains that they are still in the Union and subject to its laws, or in even asserting, as he does by the proclamations themselves, the continuing jurisdiction and authority of the national Government over them. Without any government whatever there can be no social state except that of nature. It is as impossible to conceive the existence of a civil or political State without an organism, as it would be that of an animal or vegetable body in like predicament. Stripped, however, of all the political organizations that held them together as members of this Union, they must of necessity have lapsed into a condition where everything was lost except their territorial relations and identity. In this condition, however, of local dissolution, it is admitted on all hands that they are without powers of self-resurrection; that without governments themselves they must receive their impulse from without—from their only remaining sovereign; and that these dry bones, these festering, decomposing elements must at least be breathed upon in order that they may live; and therefore it is that the Executive Magistrate, in the exercise of what he conceives to be his duty, undertakes to impart the required movement by preparing and adjusting the whole machinery, setting it in motion with his own hand, and even prescribing the law by which that motion was to be governed. Whether these States are in or out, is no longer a question, when the rupture of their connections and their own incapacity to restore them without the direction of the ultimate sovereign, are admitted elements in the case. All that remains is to decide where this transcendent power is lodged, how it is to be exercised, and who it is that is to speak this chaos into order, and to recreate from this admitted anarchy, the future organism that is to claim its place in our system.

The proclamations assume that this high and imperial function is a purely executive one, and that on the ground of the constitutional obligation on the part of the United States to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. It is only on the hypothesis either that this officer is, not in the modest language of Louis XIV, the State, but the United States; or that this executory agreement is in the nature of a law which may be enforced by the instrumentality of the sword, and without the exercise of any discretion on the part of its minister, that the case can be claimed to fall within the province of the executive department. The former of these views, which seems to find support in the argument of the gentleman from New York, I shall not trouble myself to answer. If the latter were true, and the duty itself a purely ministerial one, the claim would be unquestionable. It is so far from being true, however, that it would have been impossible even for Congress itself to provide in advance by any general enactment for the many different cases that might arise to demand its fulfillment. They have not even yet decided what is to be considered a republican form of government within the meaning of the clause, or how it is to be erected in case of the overthrow of any of the existing State governments. They have endeavored, it is true, to provide for these cases, but have been met by the argument that it would be time enough to cook their hare when it was caught, or the objection that the Executive had a better "plan" than their own, which was in itself a confession that it was a matter of doubt and discretion, and anything but the performance of a ministerial duty. That plan, like the present one, involved no less a task than the reconstruction of a State from its very foundations, and the declaration of the law that was to govern in the prosecution of that work. In the former case, the power was conferred on a title of the voters who might take the oath of allegiance and forswear the institution of slavery. In the latter, it is confined to the loyal men who had voted before, without reference to their numbers, and without any definition of the term, although it was clear that there was scarcely a loyal man in those States except those who were excluded. But will anybody say that the proclamation of the fundamental law of a State is an executive function? If there be any higher act of sovereignty than that which founds or reconstructs a State, and gives or denies the elective franchise to any of its citizens, I do not know what it is. The man who makes the elector makes the laws and the magistrates, and is practically in the enjoyment of a dictatorial power. There are occasions in the extremity of a State when such a power may be necessary for its safety. Nobody has questioned the right of the Executive to govern the conquered territories—and that by the rigors of martial law—in the recess of Congress and the absence of any other rule. No man has gone further than myself in the support of measures which were necessitated by considerations connected with the public safety. I can very well recollect the time when gentlemen upon the other side were startled by the boldness of my claims in favor of a quasi dictatorial power in the Executive, and Democratic presses held me up as the champion of absolutism. Then, however, it was claimed but as the extreme medicine of the State, and not its daily bread; not to found an empire, but to save one. Thank God! the occasion for these things has passed away. It is no longer permissible to resort to the war power for apologies for extreme measures, and particularly such as are obviously unnecessary. But there never was anything in that power to warrant the erection of a State by executive proclamation. That is an act of legislation that goes far beyond any example in British history, even in the complying times of Henry VIII, when a servile Parliament made itself alike memorable and infamous by giving to royal proclamations the force of law. I trust we are not yet ready to emulate and even improve upon this example. I do not relish the exhumation from the repositories of the dead past of such engines of arbitrary power as these. I would as soon think of going to the Tower of London to borrow the material appliances that are still there to testify of the tyranny and barbarism of the buried centuries of England. There is a flavor about them that is neither pleasant nor wholesome. If the work done through such instrumentalities had been in all respects what my own judgment would have approved, I should have hesitated long, on grounds of principle, even in the absence of any intended interference with the rights of this body, before I would have given my sanction to a precedent so fraught with mischief for future times. I would not even mar the pedigree of the returning States by allowing a bar sinister in the escutcheon of any of them. I do not care to be associated in history as a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress of the United States along with the dishonored council of the sixteenth century that betrayed the rights of Englishmen by abdicating its powers in favor of such claims as these. Crown lawyers have only defended them in high prerogative times as an expedient made necessary by the infrequency of Parliaments. There is no such apology in these cases. The very object, as confessed by the undisguised hurry to bring these new governments to our doors at the opening of the session in full panoply and compact array, was to anticipate the action of Congress in the premises. The present Executive, like his predecessor, has his plan of organization. The proclamations disclose it. He had a right, of course, to his opinions. He was, however, a southern man, and a citizen of one of the offending States. He was not likely, therefore, to think in the same way precisely as the twenty millions of the loyal States who had fought this great battle. He had never, if I mistake not, declared himself very strongly against slavery, except so far as it was in antagonism with the Union. His local associations and prejudices of education were a priori almost sure to arrest him at that point where a guarantee of the civil rights of the enfranchised class should be demanded. He had been loyal and faithful under great trials. That fidelity had made him the choice of the Union party of the North for the second office in the Republic. The bloody hand of treason opened the way for his succession to the first. It had become his right to advise, and his opinions were entitled at all events to the highest possible respect, but the mode of enforcing them was pointed out in the Constitution. It was only through Congress that he could properly make them known, and the very relation in which he stood toward the loyal States seemed to make it peculiarly appropriate that he should take no step without at least conferring with their representatives. He has not chosen to follow this course. He has preferred to treat directly with the rebels themselves, or to dictate as a conqueror such terms of restoration as were agreeable to himself. I will not say that this was done because he apprehended the existence of a different opinion here, but the effect is, that the opinion of the Executive hurried into act in advance of our assemblage—supposing such a difference not impossible—is thus staked against the will of the representative body. It is the sword of Brennus flung into the scale. It looks to me—nay, in the light of the message it is—a challenge to Congress and the free North upon a question of jurisdiction in a case where their exclusive cognizance is not even open to dispute, which we cannot afford to decline, and upon the acceptance or refusal of which will depend the determination of the point whether, in the face of an executive edict, an opposing legislative will is possible.

If a claim of this sort was stoutly and successfully resisted by our ancestors, when asserted by the Tudors and the Stuarts, how are we to excuse ourselves to posterity for surrendering it now to a mere temporary Executive of our own choice, with powers so limited and so accurately defined? I trust we have not become so habituated to the exercise of a prerogative like this as to have forgotten that there are boundaries, which in a state of peace no department of the Government can safely be allowed to pass. The danger throughout—the one prefigured by some of the leading spirits of the Revolution; the one foreshadowed when Patrick Henry declared, "Your President will be a King"—has been in this direction only. The vast discretion necessarily lodged in the Commander-in-Chief in times like those through which we have just passed, the extreme prominence of his position, and the enormous influence arising from the control of an immense expenditure, were almost sure to give to that officer a greatly preponderating weight, and to make the world—accustomed only to royal laws and royal rule—believe that it was the President alone, and not the Congress or the people, who had saved this nation, and whose business it was to restore it in all its parts. And therefore it was that the same claim of power in the proclamation of December, 1863, provoked no animadversion here, while the details of the presidential plan were subjected to the severest criticism; and no special complaint was made when the will of the law-making power was disregarded and overruled. And therefore it was, too, that the House bill failed on a second trial. And for the same reason it is now that the press and politicians of the nation, instead of controverting the power of the Executive altogether to meddle with the reorganization of these States, and denouncing the attempt on his part as a clear usurpation, have only complained in whispers and with "bated breath," that he did not extend the right of suffrage to the black man, while even so intelligent a personage as Robert Dale Owen has referred to this work of reconstruction as the greatest of the many difficult and responsible duties which the termination of the war has devolved on the new President; and even the fierce Democracy itself, which made the night of the rebellion hideous with its insulations about arbitrary power, is either smitten dumb with admiration, or swells the peans of triumphant treason with a chorus of hallelujahs in honor of the wisdom, that surprises and anticipates its wildest hopes. It seems, indeed, to have been well-nigh forgotten throughout the country, as well as at the other end of the avenue, that we have a Congress which is, under the Constitution, the law-making power of this nation. People inquire only what does the President intend; while the Associated Press ministers to their curiosity by daily bulletins, reporting every phase of the imperial pulse, as though it were watching by the bedside of royalty, and kindly informing us all of the precise terms on which the President has determined to readmit the traitors on this floor. The time has now come, however, to rectify these errors, and to assert and maintain the rightful jurisdiction and powers of this body, if they are ever to be asserted again. With the highest admiration of the constancy and heroism of the present Executive under the severest trials, and with every disposition to support his Administration so far as fidelity to my own high trust will allow, I cannot consent that a question like this, in which the interests of so many generations are involved, shall be withdrawn from the people of the loyal States, who have suffered and sacrificed so largely, and settled by the decision of any one or even seven men, no matter whence they come or what positions they may hold. No more can I allow myself to be instructed here, that while the power of settling the terms of readmission is with the President, I have no jurisdiction as an American legislator except to register the acts that he has done, and then humbly inquire as a member of this House only, whether the candidates who present themselves for admission here have complied with the mere formalities which his Legislatures have prescribed. It is here only, in these Halls, that American liberty can live. They are her inner sanctuary, her holy of holies, her strong tower of defense, her last refuge and abiding place. Here are her altars, and here her priesthood. It is only here, too, that my own great State, whose blood has been poured out like rain, and whose canonized dead are now sleeping on every battle-field of freedom, has been called into counsel during the last four years. She has no voice elsewhere. On the theory of the President and the results of his experiments she has given out no uncertain sound. She bids her sons whom she has placed on guard at the Capitol in this hour of the nation's trial, stand faithfully, as did her heroes in the bloody trench, by their trusts as Representatives, and resist with jealous watchfulness every attempt from whatever quarter to encroach upon the just powers which she has delegated to them. If the performance of this duty should involve a difference with the Executive of her own choice, while she would deplore the necessity, she will expect her Representatives to take counsel from those who sent them here, alike unawed by the frowns and unseduced by the blandishments of power. I dread the conflict, which is not a new one in the world's history, but I cannot choose but meet it when it comes; and I have a trust that we shall yet be able to discuss the great question of the times, and to settle it, too, without prejudice, and in utter oblivion of the fact that the Executive has any theory on the subject.

It has been said, however, by way of quieting the public fears, that these plans were merely experimental, and that no harm could come of them, because, under the Constitution, Congress must be the judge at last of the qualifications and eligibility of those who might present themselves for admission to seats in that body. The work accomplished, we are now awakened to the fact that the power referred to here is only that of each House acting separately upon the qualifications of its own members. While the Executive assumes the right himself of founding new governments by a new law declaring who shall vote, and settling by telegraph the terms of their constitutions, he is pleased to claim in his recent message for these creatures of his own—other but still the same—with their vitalities repaired at that fountain only—the right to resume, of course, and without inquiry into his work or theirs, the places which by an ingenious fiction they are supposed to have before held in both branches of the national Legislature, making, as he says, "the work of restoration thereby complete;" while we are instructed in terms of unusual emphasis that then it will be for us, "each of us for ourselves," to proceed to judge of the smaller matters of the law in regard to "the elections, returns, and qualifications of our own members." These instructions are, perhaps, somewhat unusual, and possibly not that kind of information precisely to which the Constitution refers, but I do not quarrel with them on grounds of etiquette, even though the advice may seem gratuitous, and the jealousy of a British Parliament might have regarded it as a breach of privilege. They are not, it is true, exactly in accordance with the tenor of the authorized report of Mr. Stearns, which did convey the opinion that we might "check these new governments at any stage, and oblige them to confess their errors," unless it was intended to affirm that power only as the special prerogative of the Executive himself. They are, however, the official utterances, and the apology assumes, of course, that there is no question of legislation involved. With this interpretation of its meaning there is nothing left to Congress but to register the edicts and ratify the work of the Executive. Taking it, however, to be otherwise, they are still not less obnoxious to objection. It may be conceded that States have been admitted heretofore without any precedent legislation, though none, I think, where they were organized under the direction of the military power, and none, certainly, without the concurrent vote of the two Houses. By those, moreover, who think that these States were never out, it will be insisted, in accordance with the executive idea, that they want no recognition, and the refusal of Congress to admit their members will be only regarded as a denial of right. But the mere negative of either House upon the question of their admission is a power greatly inferior to that which presides over their organization and prescribes the law by which the formative process is to be regulated—just as inferior as the veto lodged by the Constitution in the hands of the Executive is to the initiative of the Legislature. The builders will work according to that law, and as it prescribes, so will the structure be. As we sow, we must expect to reap. "Men do not gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles." Thus, if a privileged class is to elect the delegates, their work will be in accordance with the principle of their origin, and will be submitted, if submitted at all, for approval or rejection to the same parties who inspired it; and if the government so framed is to be recognized because it professes to be a representative one, the right of declaring its whole fundamental law might as well be accorded to the Executive as that of declaring a part of it, and assembling a convention to alter or amend that part. There was no occasion, however, for experiments of this sort, whose only tendency is to forestall the action of the legislative power, or to bring about a mischievous conflict between the two branches of the Government. If this is properly a legislative and not an executive function—as nobody can successfully deny—the President has his veto, at all events, upon the action of Congress. He cannot invert the order and change the constitutional relation by initiating an act of legislation, and leaving to Congress only a negative voice thereon, particularly in a case where the voters named by himself are expressly endowed with the power to restore the State to its constitutional relations with the Federal Government, and to present such form of government as will entitle it to the guarantee of the United States, and where, of course, it is expected that their work shall be conclusive.

It will be said, perhaps, in reply to all this, that the object here was not to found a State government, but to allow the legal voters of the old régime the privilege of altering and amending their original forms of government, so as to restore them to their constitutional relations, and entitle them to the benefit of the guarantee.

It is not to be disputed that these are a part of the objects stated in the proclamations. I will not say that this was done by way of protest against the logical conclusion from their premises, from the whole character of the act itself, and the assumption of power which it involved, that the measure was a revolutionary one—as Governor Orr admits it to have been. I shall be excused, however, for suggesting that it was unfortunate that the law adviser of the Government—perhaps its political Nestor—should have overlooked in this a departure from his own premises, that could scarcely have been excused in a junior pleader in the northern States. He had obviously forgotten the recital on which these proclamations rest—the postulate that "the revolutionary progress of the rebellion had deprived these States of all civil government whatever," and the declaration that the purpose of these conventions was to enable the loyal people of these Territories not "to alter or amend" their constitutions, but "to organize," or construct anew, where the original government was admitted to have perished. Whenever he shall be able to explain how a constitution can exist in a Government that has been altogether destroyed, or why he should have treated the process of organization as a mere process of repair,

I should be glad to hear from him. The man who reaches this conclusion from his premises, will have "no narrow frith to cross." I hope I shall not be considered uncharitable, however, in suggesting that all this inconsequential logic looks to me as if it was the effect of an unhappy struggle to escape the consequences of a doctrine which was felt to be necessary in order to raise the power in the President, and is then discarded, after having served that use, in order to remove the case from the jurisdiction of Congress. It will require something more, I think, than either the subtlety of a northern place-man or the exploded metaphysics of a Kentucky statesman, to reconcile any one step in the action of the Government, with the idea of the continuing existence of the States.

In the same spirit, however, apparently, that prompted the softening down of an organization into a mere question of alteration and amendment, there is a studied avoidance of a phraseology that has found acceptance here without even provoking criticism. We called this heretofore, in our simplicity, by the harmless name of "reconstruction." The Attorney General protests, like Bardolph, "by this light I know not the phrase," and straightway our nomenclature falls into disrepute. Well, I am ready to maintain, if necessary, in the language of the same dramatic personage, that it is "a very soldier-like word, and of exceeding good command." It is the merest hypercriticism to object its application to the adjustment of our relations with the revolting States; but whatever difference there may be here, it is impossible that there can be any dispute among scholars in regard to its precise aptitude in describing the reorganization of a State. The question is too big, however, to be settled in this way. If anybody prefers the word "restoration," I have no objection apart from its historical significance. It was the phrase used on the return of the Stuarts. I hope it is not ominous. Charles II came back without conditions, notwithstanding the efforts of Hale, who endeavored to secure them, but was put down by the assurances of General Monk, (I hope we are to have no General Monk in this case.) Bishop Burnet says that this omission was the cause of all the errors of his reign, which it required the Revolution to cure. I know that there is a confidence here, and a longing in some quarters, not unlike that of the Jacobites of England, for the return of the self-exiled royal family of the South, but I trust we are not about to lay the foundation for another revolution by the same mistake. Apart from this, I repeat that I am indifferent as to the word. It is sufficient for me that it implies, if not destruction, at least derangement, disturbance, displacement. The revolting States have, by a new law, deflected from their orbits, gathered round a new center, and ceased to compose a part of our system, or to be obedient to its law. They want renewal or regeneration. They require to be brought back by an interior adjustment that will reinstate the law that has been broken. They are in the system, and compose a part of it only de jure. Nobody can say that they are there in point of fact, because that would contradict not only our knowledge, but our senses. Something, it is admitted on all hands, must be done to reestablish their relations with the Union. They cannot do it themselves. Nobody pretends that by the mere repeal of their secession ordinances they can resume their places here—as they might do if they have not withdrawn—in virtue of their original title, and with all their rights and privileges unabridged. Their Legislatures have been even forbidden to assemble. The Executive thinks that by their act of treason the citizens consenting thereto have forfeited their highest political right—that of self-government—and that to this extent their constitutions—not as they stand now, but as they stood before the rebellion—are practically abrogated. He thinks, too, obviously, that by their abdication or dereliction—as in the case of James II—the sovereignty has lapsed—but not to us. A committee of the last House insisted that it returned to the conquered people. He claims it for himself, and accordingly sets aside their Legislatures, Governors, and Judges, reconstitutes the body-politic, declares who shall be its members, and appoints a provisional governor to keep the peace and call the privileged parties together to organize a new government. And all this is called amendment, upon the ingenious suggestion that they are to build on the substratum of their dead constitutions! No cunning phraseology, no artifice of words, however, can change the nature of a thing. The reenactment of a part of an abrogated law, either with or without addition, is no amendment. They might as well have taken the constitution of Pennsylvania to work upon, and in either case the product would have been a new constitution.

But why so studiously insist on the avoidance of other phraseology than this? Because, as it is urged, although the people of a State may destroy their government, it still subsists in gremio legis, or, in the language of the message, following that of an ingenious southern Governor, "in abeyance," or, as lawyers would phrase it, in the clouds—on the charitable hypothesis that suicide is impossible, because it is forbidden, and, therefore, by a pleasant fiction, all those pregnant acts that have scarred a continent with fire, and covered it with ruins, are simply void, and to be ignored as nullities. And this we are now informed by the Executive is "the true theory." It is undoubtedly the convenient one—for the traitors—because it furnishes no solution of the great problem of the times, except in the surrender of all control over the rebellious States, and the restoration of their people without conditions and with absolute immunity for all their crimes. Why it is the true one, he has not vouchsafed to show. I know, of course, that the high functionary who dispenses the patronage of such an empire as this is not always expected to render a reason when he chooses to dogmatize, and that, in the view of but too many of the leaders of public opinion, it is impossible for such a man to err. With a practice, however, and an admission, too, in the same breath, that "the policy of military rule over a conquered territory"—the very rule under which all that region has been governed, and all these States reconstructed during the recess of Congress—"would have implied that, by the act of their inhabitants, they had ceased to exist," it would not have been unreasonable to expect an explanation of the course that has been actually pursued within the jurisdiction of independent States, that enjoyed the rare advantage—unhappily denied to our race—of being incapable of sin, and equally unobnoxious to the penalty of death. The only answer that he could have made would have been that the doctrine, although good as a theory, was good for nothing else, because it would not work, and was utterly inadmissible in practice. The State, however, in the judgment of the President, still lives, with only an "impaired vitality," although its government has been destroyed. It is dead, to be sure, as Lazarus; in no mere trance, where the vital forces are still holding the organization together, but with all its elements putrescent or decomposed; but then there is a power in the Executive, beyond the kingly touch that purged the leprous taint from the blood of the believing, that can awaken it from the sleep of death, lead it forth in its grave-clothes, tide it safely over the frith of a four years' rebellion, and bridge over the unfathomable gulf that during all this time has divided it from the living! Yes, while it is admitted again and again that the old State governments were lost beyond even the means of self-resurrection, this modern Phoenix is supposed by some mysterious conveyance, by some metempsychosis unknown to the philosophers of Greece or the priesthood of the Nile, and only rivaled by the imposture of the Grand Lama himself, to have inherited the vital breath of the defunct State government, though that State government, dead to us, if not dead altogether, has transmigrated into the confederacy, and now lies buried among its ruins. But let us examine this new revelation.

If the acts done by these States had involved only a question of excess of power, as in the case of a law enacted by a State Legislature in violation of the fundamental law, this view of the case might have derived support from the doctrine that prevails in such cases. Here, however, the fundamental law itself was changed by the very power that enacted it. Whether right-fully or not, in view of their Federal relations, is not now the question. It is sufficient that they did, in point of fact, erect new governments upon the ruins of the old. And this, although it had been expressly forbidden, could not, in the nature of things, be prevented. There was nothing in the Constitution of the United States that could hinder the perpetration of an act either of treason or suicide. They might have allowed their governments to perish by omitting to supply their integral members, or they might have withdrawn, as they did, from the Federal connection by entering into other alliances, disclaiming its authority, and refusing to obey its law, or take any part in the administration of its affairs. All this they did, and more. It was the act of the people themselves. There was no interregnum. They carried their constitutions into their new relations—changed, it is true, in this particular, but still republican in form. They might have changed them into monarchies. Their new establishments are now overthrown. But how is this to revive others that are admitted to have previously perished? Nobody pretends that it could. The proclamations themselves admit that they have been left without governments and without means of recovery except at the hands of the Executive. Can it be truly said, then, that any portion of the original structure was rescued from the general wreck? If there was, then how much, and who shall declare it? True, one of the objects stated is to enable them to restore themselves. But does anybody insist that they can do it? Is this consistent with the grounds on which the proclamations rest? If they can, what is to be said in apology for executive interference? If they can, what is to be said of the other object declared in these instruments, which is "to enable the people of these States to present such forms of government as will entitle them to the benefit of the constitutional guarantee, by restoring them to their constitutional relations, and their people, therefore, to protection from invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence?" What does all this mean? If they were States in the Union, it required no process of organization or restoration to confer on them the advantage of these rights, because they were entitled to them already by the very letter of the Constitution. It is because they are not, because they have been "deprived of all civil government whatever," that the President proposes to make them so, and to endow them with these rights anew by reannexing and bringing them again into the Federal connection—from which they have been confessedly detached—upon a new title, by his own act, and without any agency of ours. It is a confession of outlawry which no legal acumen, no ingenuity of phrase, can explain away, and it is worse than idle to quibble upon forms of expression in the face of such an admission.

But supposing these State constitutions to be still in force as they existed antecedently to the passage of the several ordinances of secession, on the ground that all that has been enacted since in violation of the Federal law was simply void, what then was the occasion for any amendment, and whence does the President derive his authority to interfere at all, and to change the law as it stood before, even on the subject of amendments? In that case they may return, of course, whenever they think proper, without any legislation whatever. Why await the repeal of an act that is absolutely void? What is to prevent them from coming back with their constitutions as they are? Taking it to be a question of amendment only, it is clearly in their discretion to amend or not; and if they are still in the Union, there is no power here or elsewhere to say what amendments they shall make, or that they shall not resume their places here without alteration of any sort. The executive branch of the Government admits, however, that something must be done to restore these outlaws to their original status in the Union. The war has resulted, as we agree in thinking, in the emancipation of the slave, and the destruction of the elective franchise along with the government; and these things must be in some way acknowledged. They are unquestionably forfeitures; but should they refuse to recognize them, that refusal would, on his hypothesis, constitute no sufficient reason for excluding them. The question of the effect of the proclamation of freedom is one that belongs to the courts, and you cannot draw it within the jurisdiction of Congress or the President, except by assuming that these States are out and must be formally readmitted. In that case you may prescribe terms. Without that you must open when they knock, without inquiry as to their constitutions, with which you will then have nothing to do. To stipulate for the acknowledgment of these things is but to treat for their readmission on that basis, and amounts to no more or less than a compromise with a belligerent, and they may reject the conditions because you can impose no terms of amendment upon them.

Taking it, however, that their constitutions do require to be amended for these purposes, how is this work to be done? Not by executive direction certainly. The President has no more power to set up a new class of electors in South Carolina than in Massachusetts. There is but one way, and that is in accordance with the law which they prescribe themselves, which must have survived if any part of their constitutions did. The process which ignores that law, as the proclamations do, is radical and revolutionary, and is no less in effect than absolute reconstruction. The sovereign power of the people may act in this way undoubtedly, but when it does there is an end of the existing government.

A word now as to the answer that all this was intended only to allow to the people the privilege of doing this work themselves.

If the object had been only to keep the peace for the purpose of allowing these people to decide whether they would erect a new government and apply for readmission into the Union, nobody would have complained, although the necessity for interfering in this way was conclusive that they were not in a condition to exercise these rights, and that the act was not a voluntary one. But they were not asking the privilege of coming back again. It was not essential that they should come until they were ready for it. It was essential that when they did, it should be of their own pure volition. To compel it was as impracticable as it was undesirable. And yet the essence of the proclamations is a command. They are not permissive but imperative. The people might not be ready, but that made no difference. If any of them failed, it was a default. The right to vote was not a privilege, but a duty. The white men who were loyal and would take the oath must reconstruct their governments at all events. It is idle to say, therefore, that this was a mere indulgence to their prayers. It went in advance of the wishes of the people, and this is the construction placed upon it by the highest intelligences of the South.

And now as to the way in which the power claimed by the Executive has been exercised.

If the function were a purely executive one, it could not go, of course, beyond the mere permission for the assemblage of conventions, and the pledge of protection to the citizen in the exercise of this privilege. To favor classes—to proclaim that this or that citizen should not be allowed to vote, was something more than an executive act. In the case of a civil dissolution and the absence of all government, such as the proclamations admit, all were, of course, remitted to that natural equality which is recognized in the Declaration of Independence, and had only been suspended by force of the civil institutions which had then ceased to exist. The right of the negro, whether previously bond or free, was in that condition of things as perfect as that of the white man, and the latter had no more right to say to the former that he should not vote than the former had to hold the same language to him. All privileges of caste or complexion that existed under their old constitutions were gone along with the constitutions themselves. And this is in accordance with the doctrine everywhere received throughout this nation, where all limitations upon this right, except those which depend on condition only, are the results of express enactment. It was no question, therefore, of grace or favor or indulgence, and it cannot, of course, be said in excuse for the prohibition, that it was not competent for the Executive to confer the privilege on this particular class. It was not his to confer on anybody, either white or black. If he had left the election to the citizens who owed allegiance, paid taxes, and were subject to bear arms, they must have voted without distinction of color. The only question was, not whether he could confer it, but whether he could take it away. He has taken it away from others—from all who were not qualified under the old constitutions, and from all who are disloyal or refuse the oath to support the laws and proclamations in regard to slavery. The old governments with their black codes, which were the fruitful nurseries of treasurable sentiment, and have destroyed themselves by hurrying their people into the rebellion, are allowed to furnish the rule and standard of electoral fitness, on the hypothesis that there is something left of them that still lives, like the tail of a defunct reptile after the very life has been crushed out of its body, and are only to undergo alteration and repair at the hands of the same cunning workmen who had destroyed their machinery altogether. It is the same class precisely that is to renovate the work. True, it is with the condition of loyalty, and a new oath, superadded. But what are these? Who are the loyal? Not certainly those who committed treason against the nation by waging war against it, or giving aid and counsel to its enemies? But if they are excluded who are to be the voters, when the only class that proved true to its allegiance is precisely the one which was excluded under the old régime that it is now sought to restore? How many of the original voters, beyond those who were driven into exile, have stood by the old flag in the hour of our trial? Was it a majority—was it even a tithe? Can there be as many such men found as would have saved Sodom from destruction? We know that there cannot, because we know that they would not have been tolerated on southern soil. We know it, too, from the declaration of the Governor of Virginia, that unless the law that disfranchised the traitors only from January, 1864, was repealed, there would not be men enough left to organize the State. And is it seriously proposed that the power of erecting governments, in order to enable these States to resume their places in the Union, shall be vested in a score of men out of a population counting by millions? But how is the question of loyalty to be determined? Not by the oath, because that is merely cumulative, and is not offered either as a test, or by way of purgation for past offenses. If as a test, the word might as well have been omitted altogether. How then? Is there a virtue in the amnesty which works not only oblivion for the past, but converts a pardoned traitor into a loyal man? Is it by judgment of law on conviction of crime? Is it by attainer on proclamation by the Executive? Is it by a trial in pais or by compurgators at the hustings? If the old constitutions are still in force, either by construction of law or by virtue of the proclamations, the exclusion even of those who may be impeached of disloyalty looks amazingly like the forfeiture of a legal franchise, without judgment and without law, and is too high a power to be exercised by any other than the sovereign.

But there is another condition superadded by way of abridgment of the right; and that is the exaction, even from the loyal, of the oath to support the proclamations and laws relating to slavery. No friend of the country will of course object to any wholesome limitations upon the privilege; but if it was not competent to the President, not to confer, but only to permit it to the black man, what authority was there to limit it in this way to the white man? Neither the Constitution of the United States nor that of any of the States has ever required an oath of this sort from the voter. If he could impose this, what was there to prevent him from swearing them to the observance of all acts of Congress and all proclamations, or requiring them to swear that they had never given any aid or countenance to the rebellion? If he could disfranchise the unconvicted traitor, what was there to prevent him from enfranchising the loyal man who has become free? But what is the security which it furnishes? How long is the obligation to endure? Did it bind the members of the conventions? And if these bodies have defined the qualification in a different way, are the voters now free?

The programme is in effect to recommit these governments to the hands of the very men who hurried them into the rebellion, upon the sole condition of a new obligation of fealty, after having just broken a previous one, and to abandon the field to the conquered as soon as it is won! Was ever such a dénouement to such a drama? But is there anybody in the loyal States who is willing to release all the securities, all the rights and advantages acquired by the war, and prescribe no terms to those whose lips have just been dyed with perjury, and whose hands are still dripping with the blood of our butchered sons, except a renewal of their already broken vows, which they will make voluntarily, and then claim to have no binding force because they have been made under a sort of duress, on the ethics taught by a distinguished casuist of Maryland? What kind of a test is this for a statesman? Would any rational Government on earth be content with such a caution? Who does not know its utter worthlessness? What is it but the flaxen tie that bound the wrists of the Hebrew champion? What is its value, in view of the events of the rebellion that have now passed into history? How is our past experience? Have these people ever kept faith with us? Did it hold any of the rebel leaders who filled employments either civil or military under the Federal Government, or under those of the revolting States? Was not perjury exalted into honor of the highest chivalric type; children taught by their own southern mothers that they were under no obligation to keep faith with Yankees, and that they might swear and forswear themselves again and again, to save their persons or their property; and the very highest species of the crimen falsi canonized even by the tender and admiring regards of northern generals and northern statesmen? It may be safely assumed, as a general proposition, that those who were most forward to abjure their sworn allegiance here, will be the first to violate their new-made vows, by swearing themselves back again into legislative honors and governmental favors. But will you consent to turn over the few Union white men, and your thousands of faithful allies among the blacks, to the tender mercies of these unconverted and unrepentant rebels, and bring them back again into these Halls on pledges of fidelity that amount at last to no more than an engagement not to repeat an experiment against which you will now want no other security than the recollection of your power? If you are wise you will not be content with any assurances that are either purchased by interest or extorted by necessity. You will render it impossible for them to deceive you again, by refusing to trust them until they shall have reestablished their title to your confidence. Security is more important to you than punishment, ay, even than the demands of justice. Others may do as they please, but as for me, I must beg to be excused from giving my faith to these new-fledged neophytes, these unbaptized renegades, until they have stripped to the skin and bathed themselves thoroughly in the waters of regeneration.

But, supposing this guarantee be a merely executive function, how does the manner of performance square with the object sought to be attained? The obligation is to assure a government that shall be republican. The meaning of this is that it shall be a government of the people. The process adopted, in direct contravention of the principles of the message, is to lodge the power in the hands of a privileged class, the same that held it before, distinguishable only by the accident of color, along with a disloyalty to the Union that was almost universal, and composing, in some instances, a minority of the whole population. Does this look like a fulfillment of the obligation, or even squint in that direction? The form, it is true, may be republican, because it looks to representation by election. But that is not the test. If it were, every constitutional monarchy in Europe might be brought within the category. It is the distinction of classes, the permanent limitation of the right of suffrage to a favored few, that makes the difference between the aristocratic and republican forms, and there is none other. In this case the right is confined to the loyal white man who will take the oath. This, however, if not an oligarchy or government of the few, is at least an aristocracy or government of classes, and furnishes a perfect exemplification of just that species of legislation which is so earnestly reprobated in those passages of the message where the President informs us that "this Government springs from and was made for the people;" that "it should, from the very consideration of its origin, be strong in its power of resistance against the establishment of inequalities;" that "monopolies, perpetuities, and class legislation are contrary to the genius of a free Government, and ought not to be allowed;" that "here there is no room for favored classes or monopolies," and that "we shall fulfill our duties as legislators by according equal and exact justice to all men, special privileges to none." If I have found occasion to commend his practice at the expense of his theory upon the question of State sinlessness and State immortality, subscribing as I do most heartily to these axioms of political science, I shall feel myself compelled to adjust the account by following his advice in opposition to his practice here. "Class legislation" and "special privileges" of a sovereign character, are the distinguishing features of his plan, and it is, therefore, by the erection of an aristocracy that the guarantee of a republic is to be made good!

Whether these States be in the Union or not, it is conceded by the Executive, in the effort to provide them with republican governments, that they are now without them; and this, I suppose, for the reason that they have no governments at all. The same result, however, would have followed from the change in the condition of the slave. A Government that not only denies to a majority, or even a large portion of its free citizens, the privilege of any share in its administration, but rejects their testimony as witnesses, interdicts to them the acquisition of knowledge, or refuses the advantages of the marital relation, is not republican, and the men who have made these laws, and insist on maintaining them now, will never make it so. Mr. Burke remarks that, taking the State to mean "the whole commonwealth, with all its orders, and all the rights appertaining to each," "to be under the State, but not the State itself, or any part of it—that is, to be nothing at all in the commonwealth, is a condition of civil servitude by the very force of the definition. Servorum non est respublica is a very old and a very true maxim. The servitude that makes men subject to a State without being citizens may be more or less tolerable from many circumstances, but these circumstances do not alter the nature of the thing." And this he regards as a modified form of slavery; while "the exclusion of whole classes of men from the higher or ruling part of the commonwealth, as in the case where a hereditary nobility possesses the exclusive rule, is only held to imply a lower and degraded state of citizenship. But even there it is only the office, and not the franchise, that is denied to the subject."

"Our constitution," he continues, "was not made for great, general, or proscriptive exclusions. Sooner or later it will destroy them, or they will destroy the constitution. In our constitution there has always been a difference between a franchise and an office, and between the capacity for the one and for the other. Franchises are supposed to belong to the subject as a subject, and not as a member of the governing part of the State. The policy of the Government has considered them as things very different; for when Parliament excluded by the test acts Protestant dissenters from all civil and military employment, they never touched their right of voting for members of Parliament, or sitting in either House—both these being treated by him as franchises of which the subject could not be deprived. In a republic, however, there is no proper distinction between the governing part and the subject, and the office, of course, would stand on the same ground as the franchise.

An American statesman of the present day would say, perhaps, that the elective franchise, the most important of them all, is not the property of the citizen, because it is not a natural right, but a political one. I have heard such language here, even on this side of the House, again and again. I am too dull to comprehend the distinction. I take it that all governmental agencies, all political contrivances and privileges, are but the machinery for the protection of the great natural rights of humanity, which protection is admitted by the Declaration itself to be the only legitimate object of all government. Why are our institutions free? Because they allow to you and me the privilege of governing ourselves. Why am I a freeman? For no other reason than because I am armed with the ballot for my own protection as a citizen. Strip me of that and I am at your mercy. You may deal gently with me, it is true, and so might the Sultan of Turkey, but that makes no difference. I am still the slave of your caprice, and my rights and happiness may depend, like your temper, on the state of your digestion. You may designate this franchise by what name you please, but you cannot refine it away by verbal distinctions or scholastic subtleties, by calling it political or giving to it any other nomenclature. You might as well deny me all the rights of a citizen, because they are all political, as deny me that one—the most important of them all—which is essential to the protection of the residuum. Nor can you pilfer it from me by the jugglery of assigning to it the distinction of a prerogative or privilege. I know no prerogatives here, and no privileges that are not, or at least ought not to be common to us all. The message itself reprobates a subterfuge like this when it asserts the great republican idea of "equal rights for all, special privileges to none." No: you must either settle the principle that this is a white man's Government alone, or you must share all your political rights with men of all complexions who inhabit among you. The Democrats, par excellence, who love slavery for its own sake, and do not of course favor the doctrines of either liberty or equality as to the black man, accept the alternative that this is a white man's Government—as does the President himself in his one-sided argument with the dusky committee that waited on him a day or two ago, when he declines to answer as to South Carolina, assumes that they are not a portion of the people, and advises them to emigrate from the country which he had previously declared to be their own—and are therefore consistent and logical in denying the suffrage to the negro, as they are in favoring the policy that ignores the war and seeks to rehabilitate the aristocracy of the South. I wish I could say as much for the Union party as a whole on this floor. Gentlemen of that faith are without apology when they agree with them in either.

The proclamation has made the negro nominally free. He counts in the representation. He pays taxes, and must bear arms if necessary, and he has done it. No sensible man now pretends to doubt that he is a citizen, or can doubt it in view of these considerations. The interference of the Executive is put expressly on the ground of the obligation of the national authority to secure a republican form of government to each of the States. To effect this, it is essential that a majority should be allowed to enjoy the political right of governing, and that all should share alike in its direction. To put any class under the State would be to deprive them of the rights of citizens, and to reduce them, in the words of the authority just cited, to a state of civil servitude. It is essential, moreover, that it should rest, in the language of the Declaration, on "the consent of the governed." An establishment that does not conform to these principles is not republican, whether the power be lodged with the oligoi or the aristoi. No matter as to its forms. We are not to be cheated by appearances or names. It was something more than the mere form that the Constitution intended to secure. And yet the process here ignores all these things and rests either upon the dimmest perceptions of free government, or upon the southern theory that the negro is not a man, or that this Government was only intended for white men. If the proposition were to exclude all men of Celtic blood, what a sensation would it not produce among the Democracy? If the difference, however, is only against the African, consistency would require that he should also be excluded from the enumeration hereafter. With the end of the "divine institution," the three-fifths clause, which stipulated for a representation, not of or for him, who was not then a man, but for his master, has ceased to operate. If the freed slave is now a citizen, he has a right to all the privileges, as he is confessedly subject to all the duties which that relation involves. If instead of rising from the fractional value to that of an integer, he is no longer a member of the State, he must cease to owe any other than a domiciliary allegiance, and the idea of a representation founded on his existence here, must be exploded forever. And from this dilemma there is no escape. If he is a citizen, the elective franchise is his right. If he is not, representation on that basis is logically inadmissible.

The effect of the oligarchic process is to reinstate the governing class as it was before, without any check upon it. This we cannot afford to do. There is, fortunately for us, a loyal element among them that has helped us to bring them back, and may be used to keep the peace, not by either arming or disarming it, but by the restoration of a mere right, which is essential to its protection as well as our own. It is a happy circumstance that the measure of security required by the people of the loyal States is precisely that which the Constitution has imposed on us as a duty. The obligation is to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government. If "the whole commonwealth, comprehending all its orders, with the privileges belonging to each," is not republican, we are bound to make it so, and are endowed by the Constitution with all the powers necessary for that purpose. But how are these powers to be exercised? Not by the President, because he cannot prescribe the terms. Not by mere refusal on the part of Congress to admit, because that would be a refusal to perform, but by an act of legislation which it will be only the duty of the President to enforce. It is a narrow view of this duty which gives to it a merely negative character, such as to put down a usurpation, or drive out a tyrannical majority. There is a positive obligation to warrant or make sure to all the people, a republican form of government; and here is the power that has been sought for so diligently under the law of war, to deal with the conquered territories in such a way as to secure to all their loyal people the rights to which they would be entitled under a republican form of government, and to protect the Union itself from all future disturbance. These States are without governments of any sort—those which existed and were disloyal having been overthrown. It is our constitutional duty to supply them with new ones of a republican character, and to provide that none other shall be erected. If their black population—if a majority of their loyal inhabitants—nay, if a mere minority demand the fulfillment of this guarantee, by insisting that we shall provide them with a government that shall admit them to the rights of citizenship, and be at least partly within their own control, we cannot evade the performance by the plea of a want of constitutional power. The declaration of the duty gives it to us, with all the incidental means. That duty is not denied; but we have wielded the sword so long to enforce the law, that many people have come to the conclusion that there is no other weapon for such a case, when in point of fact it is clearly inadequate to this part of the work, and the power of the Legislature is the only one that can successfully accomplish it. It is undoubtedly in accordance with our practice, as it is with the spirit of our institutions, that it should be left to the people themselves, in the first place, to be performed by them in that condition of freedom which our arms have given them. But if they will not do this of their own accord—if the class that has been accustomed to rule, will insist on holding the rein and denying to their fellows, even to a respectable minority of them, the rightful privilege of citizens under a republic, I know no possible way of meeting the case but by interposing ourselves and prescribing a fundamental law for the occasion. It will not be enough, as I have already remarked, to refuse the Congressmen who may apply on terms that are inadmissible to us. That would be only a denial of justice to the disfranchised which might prove indefinite, instead of the fulfillment of an admitted obligation. If there be any limitation of the right of suffrage it must come from the supreme authority, which is here. There is no power elsewhere, and certainly none in a society that is yet in a state of chaos, formless and void, and with nothing but darkness brooding over it. That authority, it is true, might well disfranchise individuals, such as the traitors themselves, for an enormous crime which showed that they could not be safely trusted with so important a function. It could not, however, proscribe a whole class, comprising a majority of the loyal people, all native to the soil and impeached of no crime, merely because they had black skins or woolly hair, without violating the essential principles of republicanism, and laying the foundations of an aristocratic government. No argument could defend it, except on the judicial hypothesis that the race so excluded had no rights at all that a white man was bound to respect, which would be fatal of course, as already shown, to the whole principle of representation as applied to it. But this hypothesis has no foundation in our early history or practice. The founders of this Government never dreamed of such a distinction. The great charter of our fathers had before affirmed the equality of all men. It was not race or color, but condition, that created the constitutional disability. The slave, of course, could not, in the nature of things, be admitted to the privileges of a citizen, because that would have been inconsistent with his condition. Everybody else was counted, except the Indian who paid no taxes—an incarnation, by the way, of the revolutionary formula, stereotyped on the hearts of the colonists, that condensed the causes of their struggle into two memorable and mighty words. The notion that a taint of African blood, or any diversity of complexion, was a disqualifying feature, is a purely modern invention, which is but the growth of that barbarous and unnatural system that has debauched the moral sentiment, and left in many minds only the feeblest conceptions of rational freedom. The free negro voted originally almost everywhere. It was a consequence only of his unquestioned citizenship. To admit him, it did not require a special grant by the insertion of the word "black" in any republican constitution. To exclude him it did require the insertion of the word "white." The only color that the framers of the Constitution seem to have ostracized is the red. But even here it excepted the tax-payer, and was not by a designation of race. They had sense enough to know that a principle of exclusion resting on so uncertain a basis as color, would be unfitted for any constitution.

Apart, however, from the considerations already stated, there are special reasons in the present case for insisting that the guarantee shall be fulfilled in good faith; and these are, to recompense the black man for his unwavering loyalty in the hour of trial, to afford him the means of self-protection in the enjoyment of the rights he has so richly earned, and if these are not enough, to protect ourselves against any future disturbance from the same arrogant and presumptuous class which has just been chastised into a decent respect for ourselves and a reluctant submission to our laws.

We began the war by repelling the black man and returning him to his master; by doing everything, in short, to alienate him from ourselves, and prove to him that he had nothing to expect from us; and this was called statesmanship! If ever a people deserved to be chastised it was ourselves, for the ineffable baseness and fatuity which refused the aid of the negro, and sent a hundred thousand white men to die, rather than wound the pride, or harm the property of an enemy! We failed to drive him from our support even by the unkindest usage. When we plunged within the storm-cloud that overhung the South, and concealed everything from outside view, we were not long in discovering that the white skin was everywhere synonymous with the traitor heart, and that wherever we could meet a black man we were sure to find a friend. He took our soldier by the hand, led him through the outposts, pointed out the secret path, traveled with him by night, shared his last crust with him, and baffled the bloodhounds that were on his track. As the war progressed, we began to find that with such an auxiliary against us, success was impossible. We made him free. But still we could not lift him into the position of a soldier, which was a privilege of caste in ancient times. People who foresaw that the step was an easy one from the soldier to the citizen—themselves of craven hearts and more slaves than he—insisted that he was like his detractors, loved his chains, and was a coward by instinct, and that the white soldier was a fool, who would throw down his arms if you sent him an auxiliary whose skin was not quite as fair as his own. You listened and believed. But by and by, impelled by necessity, you allowed your brave and right-thinking Secretary of War to arm him quietly. You rather winked at than encouraged it; and before long the truth blazed upon you from the trenches of Port Hudson that the black man was in your ranks. He has now added to the title that God Almighty gave him, a claim upon your gratitude. How do you propose to pay it?

Nothing is clearer than that you have made the privilege of the ballot necessary for his protection, by making him nominally free, and using him to put down the rebellion of his master. That master will not soon forget the infidelity of the slave on whom he relied, or the humiliation that the proud chivalry has suffered at the hands of its own born thralls. Even the bond of interest that compelled him to treat that slave with kindness, because he was his money, is now broken. Unable to wreak his baffled vengeance upon you, he longs to pay back the debt he owes you, by visiting his impotent malice upon the humble instrument of your triumph, and proving to the world the truth of what he has so often told it, that you have only made his condition worse by elevating him to freedom. He begs you to withdraw your black troops. He wishes to be relieved from your authority, by being allowed to resume his place in the Union which he hates. For this he is willing to recognize the results of the war in the nominal emancipation of the slave, if you will leave him subject to his authority, without rights of citizenship, and without any security for the practical enjoyment of the liberty you have given him. He can afford to make this offer, and others which the Executive hails as unexpected evidence of progress—because he cannot help it. The only surprise to me is that on such an invitation the whole South did not rush incontinently into the executive embrace. But will you accept it? If you do, what is your gift of freedom to the black man? It is but "the Dead sea fruit, that tempts the eye but turns to ashes on the lips." What will you have done for "the ward of the Republic," as he was characterized by our generous and noble-minded martyr President, if he is to pass into the condition of a Pariah, and to accept just such terms as his humbled and exasperated master may impose on him? You will only have mocked him with the mirage of liberty to make his condition tenfold worse than it was before. Is this the fulfillment of your pledged faith? Was it your purpose only "to keep the word of promise to the ear, and break it to the hope?" It was the very refinement of cruelty to have inspired such hopes, only to disappoint them. Better, far better, have left the miserable victim of your guile to the slavery in which you found him, content, perhaps, with his condition, and dreaming of no change, than thus to lift him from the earth, only to dash him down again under the feet of his oppressor. Better for yourselves, too, for your present credit and your future fame, if you had declined his services altogether. The world, in that case, would only have regarded us as fools. It will now justly point its finger of scorn at the Government which was capable of the meanness of turning its back on the benefactor to whom it appealed, and appealed successfully, in the hour of its sore distress. What is this but trusting the lamb to the vulture? Will the governing class, to whose tender mercies you are expected to turn him over, because they understand his nature and his interests better than you do, ever suffer him to rise from his degraded condition? What is your experience already on this point? What earnest, what foretaste, what assurances do these men give you of future reformation, even now that the motives for good behavior are so exigent and overwhelming? The condition of the black man as a slave disqualified him as a witness against the master race, who were thus practically in the exercise of a power that placed his person and his life at the mercy of his paler brother. He is now free. Without this privilege, he has no rights that a white man can be compelled to respect. It is essential to his security. No court within the wide area of civilization would exclude him or any other man from the witness stand on the ground of race or color. If admitted, and untruthful, as they insist he is, his credibility is still a question for a jury of white men. And yet with this advantage, this badge of servitude is still insisted on, and instead of closing the courts of justice—if they deserve that name, where evidence is excluded on system, and the tribunal of a Turkish cadi would be shamed—the Federal Government submits to the humiliating necessity of withdrawing all controversies, wherever the rights of a negro are involved—ignoring those wherein his testimony might be required between white men—within a special jurisdiction of its own, while it allows these people to make constitutions, just to enable them to escape its power, and do their own will in such particulars as these, as though they were really free of our rule and could be safely trusted with the performance of such a work! But how is it in regard to the marital relation, with all its incidents? How as to education and preparation for the ballot? Have the schools been thrown open to him? Is he free to work on his own terms, to acquire property, to go about wherever his interests or inclination may lead him, and to seek employment at such wages as he can fairly earn—or is he still subject to condemnation as a vagrant, and sale or apprenticeship for fines and jail fees? What says the official report of General Schurz, the result of a long and extended tour, which is so mysteriously ignored, while in the face of its authentic and overwhelming testimony the President is relinquishing our blood-bought conquests to the enemy without even taking the advice of Congress, though now sitting at the capital, and proving the tranquillity of the South by the result of a five days' sojourn in three of its principal towns, which developed the fact that black troops could not be employed to advantage because it would be necessary to accumulate them in large bodies for their own protection? How is it in Mississippi, where the local militia are already stripping the negro of the arms purchased from you as cherished heir-looms, dear memorials, consecrated by the war of liberty, and stained, perhaps, with their own blood, spilt in your own defense, or with the blood of the discomfited barbarians who are now so valorously disarming them? How is it in Tennessee? How in Virginia? It is not the overthrow of the rebellion, but of the abolitionists of the North, that constitutes the inspiring and exultant theme of the Speaker of its House of Delegates. He thanks God that Virginia can still trample on the rights of the black man, because, as he thinks—and as the Executive thinks of all these States—she has never been out of the Union. How, then, is the condition of the negro improved by emancipation, under a policy that cuts him off from the enjoyment of all protection in person or property, and is intended obviously to keep him in the bonds of servitude, and to prove to the world that the real victory is theirs, and that your boon of freedom was only a cheat and a delusion? What is there to prevent the reenactment of the whole black code in any of these States as soon as they shall have been relieved from our control by readmission into the Union upon the terms of the Executive? If you object—ay, even to the imprisonment of a northern seaman—you will be told as formerly that these are matters of State regulation only. Will you appeal to the courts or send ambassadors to Charleston to negotiate an amicable submission? They will set your courts at defiance, and drive you out with scorn and contumely, as they did before, and the Democracy of the North will clap their hands and exult over your discomfiture. Is the peace of the country to be secured in this way? You have carried the cup of freedom to the lips of the black man and he has drunk of it. If you would make of him a peaceful citizen, and an obedient member of the State, you must protect him in the enjoyment of the liberty you have given him. To do this it is only necessary to invest him with the defensive armor of the ballot. That will secure to him the consideration of the white man. That will make it the interest of the superior classes to cultivate him. That will educate him into an intelligent acquaintance with his duties. That will secure peace and harmony to the land. The black man has shown himself to be as docile, gentle, and humane as he has approved himself loyal and brave. He will make a valuable citizen if fairly dealt with. But remember! he is a man, who has tasted liberty, and felt the glow of an unaccustomed manhood, as his pulse danced with a new inspiration when he looked up at the folds of your starry banner on the perilous edge of the battle. Beware how you allow these men, who have never yet learned, and never will learn anything, to trample on him now. The policy foreshadowed in the proclamations will make only a discontented people. It is the slogan of battle—the herald's denouncement of that war of races, which is so strangely apprehended by those who urge the very opposite policy to heal up a war of sections. It is the preparation for these deluded people of a future, before which even the savage horrors of their own revolt may pale. The kindred policy that ruled our councils in the same interest for two long years—as it seems to rule them now—proved fatal to the system it was intended to serve by making its preservation impossible.

It may be that God Almighty intends to finish His great work by giving a further rein to the infernal spirit that precipitated these madmen into the revolt that melted the chains of their slaves. Let us see to it that we be not called upon to repress the outbreak of nature, by drawing our own swords hereafter upon our faithful allies in the war of freedom. We can prevent this now—and will if we are wise—by a mere act of justice that is simple and reasonable, and will trench on no man's rights, while it will extend the area of freedom by popularizing these governments and bringing them at once to the republican standard of the Constitution. That act is demanded by considerations of the highest wisdom, as well as of the strictest justice. It were a foul shame to refuse it, and a fouler still to add to that refusal the future possible infamy of turning our own arms, at the call of these delinquents, upon the trusty auxiliaries who have assisted in subduing them, when the tyranny of their oppressors and the instinctive yearnings of humanity, may drive them to resistance. I should blush for my country, and weep for it, too, if it was capable of an atrocity so unutterably base.

But though we were even insensible to the claims of justice and the emotions of gratitude, and entirely indifferent to the elevation of the negro race for its own sake, we want their vote for our own protection. Our best security is to erect a breakwater against the encroachments of the disaffected white man by enlisting the counteracting influence, the cheap support in peace, of the loyal black man, to whom we have so successfully appealed in war. We need his suffrage now to assist us in keeping that peace which he had so large a share in making. Take away his musket, if you please, but do not disarm him entirely. The question with me is not whether you can trust him, but whether you can trust the man who asks you to give him the rule again over his rescued bondsman. There are two classes of white men in the seceding States. The higher and more intelligent is essentially anti-republican in habit and sentiment, while the inferior and ignorant is even more abject and servile than the slave himself. He may be educated, however, into a just self-respect and a sense of his own interests. The governing class never can. To make them republican you must change their whole social system and their natures along with it. Until you do, and they are thoroughly regenerated, they will be unsafe depositaries of power in a Government like this. If you will not disfranchise the man who has already shown that he is unworthy of trust, you must at least render him powerless for mischief by placing a sentinel over him, with the bloodless but potent weapon of the ballot to keep him in order. I do not insist that you shall disfranchise the rebel who professes to have repented, because without him you will have no white element in the case. I have no objection that you should pardon his crime and even restore to him his lands, if you think that the interests of justice require no indemnity, and no examples. My object is not vengeance. I do not thirst for his blood, even with all his barbarities. Give him back everything else. But for the power which he has shown himself unworthy to hold, and which he has so justly forfeited, restore not that, I adjure and beseech you, by the recollection of the bloody trial through which you have passed; by the respect you owe to the bereaved, the widowed, the orphaned, the maimed who yet live; and above all, by the memory of your martyred, butchered, starved, and mutilated dead. Insult them not by the declaration that the earth has drunk their blood in vain. Expose not yourselves to the bitter reproach, that before their bones have been gathered by pious hands from the fields where they have been left to bleach unburied, their very murderers have been hurried back into your embrace like returning conquerors. If this reunion is to be solemnized on terms like these, wait at least until you have put off your mourning, and stripped your public places of the habiliments of woe. Bury your murdered President out of sight. Cover up the graves of Andersonville, with all their horrid secrets, and then—then celebrate these unholy nuptials—if you can. Let it not be said, at all events, to your discredit, that “the funeral-baked meats have coldly furnished forth the marriage table.” Open no hall of Valhalla, where the returning braves of the South shall quaff their foaming ale, and pledge you from the grinning skulls of your own dead and forgotten heroes.

But there is another consideration that gives us the right, and makes it an imperative necessity, for our own protection, to insist that the negro shall be allowed to share the rights of citizenship in their highest sense, and that is the fact that the conversion of the chattel into a freeman will greatly enlarge the representation of those States, and bring into Congress some thirty votes on the basis of this peculiar population, while the loyal States must suffer from the increase. If they come, it must be in a representative capacity of course. But whose representatives will they be, if the whole class in whose names they come, and for whom they profess to speak, is to have no voice in their election? To call them representatives of any other than the ruling class would be a gross abuse of language. The benefit of your act of emancipation then is to inure to the master who has endeavored to break up your Government, while the black man still holds substantially the relation of a slave, and is only used to count for the benefit of his oppressors! And whom will they send to manage the affairs of the Union in the name of the slave? Will it be the man whom he would select himself? Will it be an advocate of his interests? Will it be those who will provide for the payment of the debt of the war, or the pensions pledged to the families of the brave soldiers whose very bones will be spurned aside with contumely by the rebel plowman? What is our experience thus far? Among the first men sent here from Louisiana was a signer of the secession ordinance, and all three gravitated at once, as by a natural law, into the ranks of the party that opposed the war. The first offering from Arkansas to the other end of the Capitol was a graduate of the same school. But will the holders of our public debt—will our brave volunteers agree to this? No! Ask the men here, however, who sympathized with the rebellion throughout, and denounced the war and the debt made by it as alike unlawful, and though professing to be Democrats, they will answer with one voice that this representation by proxy is right and proper, although they do not even admit the negro to be a citizen, and hardly confess him to be a man. While he continued a slave there was nothing unreasonable in the agreement that the master should speak for him, if he was to be heard at all, because he could have no will of his own. It was at all events the bargain, and we stood by it. That slave is now, however, a freeman. He has a will of his own, and the man who owned him no longer represents it, but the contrary. Looking to his present relations to the late slave, his assumption of the right to speak for him is a double outrage on the black man. It is not only to deny him a representative, but to give that office to his enemy. It is in effect to reenslave him.

If the white man of the South is of the opinion that the negro is not fit to vote at home, he decides at the same time that he is not worthy to be represented here; and in claiming that right, asks for himself a power in the Government that will make one unrepentant traitor the equal, in many instances, of two or three loyal northern men. He admits the injustice, too, while he preserves his consistency, by rejecting the negro himself in the interior apportionment of some of his own States. But is it just to the loyal States that he should exercise this power in the Federal Government? Will they consent to this inequality, now that the remedy is in their own hands? Are these people to be rated in their condition of subjugation at their own estimate before putting their armor on, as having vindicated their claim to be considered the master race, and so outweigh twice or thrice their number of northern mudsills? Speaking for myself, I do not choose to have my delegated powers as the Representative of one hundred and thirty thousand northern freemen neutralized by a representative of this sort, whether he come here by the congé d'élire of a military commander, or is puffed in this direction by the arrogant breath of a feeble but aristocratic constituency. If the white men of the South will insist that the negro shall have no political rights in the States, while he is to appear here to claim a recognition at our hands only to add to the power of the oligarchy in this Government, then I would insist that he shall appear here either in person, or by his attorney, or curator, or next friend, and not by a guardian or trustee under the appointment of his quondam master, which would be the sublimest of farces. If they are not content with this, then I would say to them, wait until by a constitutional amendment we can offer you the fairer basis of suffrage, which will enable you to swell your numbers as soon as you shall be prepared to do justice to the black man.

It is insisted, however, and most especially by those who profit most by the laws of naturalization, and the principle of universal suffrage, of which they have therefore been the unvarying champions, that the negro is ignorant, and must be educated before he can be allowed to enjoy the privileges necessary for his own protection as a citizen—which is to say, in effect, that ignorance disqualifies for freedom, and ought to make a man a slave. It may be a question whether it were not well if that had been made a condition with all men. But why demand that of the indigenous black man who has been reared under our institutions, and has perhaps shouldered his musket in their defense, which is not asked of the foreigner whose vote and sympathies have been against us? Is he inferior in these respects to the Celtic Irishman who holds the destinies of your great metropolis in his hands? His instincts at all events—supposing them to be his highest faculty—have taught him to take the side of liberty when the savage who burned him was exerting himself in the interests of the governing classes of Europe, from whose oppressions he had sought an asylum here, to overthrow the very Government which had so generously opened its arms to receive him, and lifted him from the dust into the privileges of a citizen. I would take that instinct, and use it as a counterpoise against the crude, uninstructed element that comes to us from abroad. I do not fear that it will fall under the influence of the aristocratic class any more than it did during the war. The negro will be sure to look with jealousy and suspicion upon the task-master from whose arms he has been torn, and who will still continue to regard him as his rightful property. That aristocracy, moreover, landless as it is soon destined to be, under another and a better social system, is sure to be swallowed up ere long by the upheaval of the lower stratum, when labor, now become respectable, shall assert its rightful supremacy, and the strong sinews of toil shall reclaim their lost inheritance by seizing upon the soil.

But who are they that make this objection? Only the master himself and his northern friends. If they think so, however, why do they object? What harm can come to the lords from the maintenance of the patriarchal relation, by turning it into a bond of kinship and good offices that will rival the constitution of the Highland clan? But they do not think so. They affirmed with equal confidence that the negro would cleave to his master, and fight for him, if he would fight at all; but it turned out to be a mistake, as every man of common sense knew very well it would. If the power of the master had been equal to that of the northern demagogue, he might possibly have taken sides against the Government with the same unanimity as the imported Caucasian who was led as an ox to the shambles, and made, like a blind Samson, to lay his hands upon the pillars of our Constitution in that dark hour when all the powers of earth and hell seemed leagued together for its destruction. The negro has already solved that question in a way that shames even the poor white man of the South, who is indeed obnoxious to this imputation, and from whose example it might have been plausibly inferred, but for the experience of this war, that he would have yielded to the same influences. But what authority is there for the assertion that the black man is more ignorant than the poor whites of the South who delight in shooting, or the imported patriots of the North who gratify their equally savage tastes by burning him? Look at the revelations of the census and see what they declare. I venture to say that, considering the difference of condition and opportunity, the black man is no way the inferior. It is sufficient, however, that he has proved intelligent enough to be loyal, when his highly educated master was not saved from treason by his superior instruction. But who shall say that this loyalty was the fruit of ignorance? Not those, certainly, who prize the republican State, and think that knowledge is essential to its preservation. Its chief advantage is, perhaps, its felicitous adaptation to the general standard of humanity in its extreme simplicity of form, and the fact that it requires so little of the learning of the schools to govern it. It would have perished in the recent trial, if it had been left to the wisdom of its statesmen. It was the uneducated common sense, the reasoning instinct only, of its own people, that saved it. God defend us from the statesmen and diplomatist whom this revolution has evolved!

But if the negro is ignorant, whose fault is it, and what is the remedy? Has he not been studiously denied the privilege which his white and zealous Democratic rival has so largely neglected, of learning even to read? And is the slave-owner, who is responsible for this, to meet us with the confession that he has purposely kept this man in darkness because he feared that a spark might fall upon his intellect that would kindle into flame and melt his chains, and then convert his own inextinguishable wrong into an argument against his freedom, and ask us to wait upon the education of the man who has just shown that he is better fitted for its enjoyment than himself? Thank Heaven! it does not require an education in the schools to make a man love liberty. The whole infernal system of black laws is founded on the dread of human instinct, and the fear that the natural struggles of humanity, if aided even by such feeble lights as might be accessible to him in his condition of servitude, would result in making him a freeman. They are themselves a pregnant confession that the slave is gifted with powers and susceptibilities that might be awakened into mischievous activity, and cultivated for the highest duties of citizenship in a free State. Whether the ignorance of the inferior class, either imported from abroad or thus diligently cultivated at home, ought to constitute a disqualification, it is perhaps too late to inquire, since the policy of the country, shaped and fashioned by the Democratic party, has settled it as a principle that the right of self-government cannot be justly made to depend upon the education or intelligence of the voter. It may be right for the twofold reason that the love of liberty is heaven-born, and the right to vote the best educator of the freeman. If gentlemen on the other side have come now to think differently, I have no objection to go back and trust the suffrage only to those who can read and write, and have been long enough among us to understand our institutions—to shake themselves loose from all foreign domination—to unlearn the Old World ideas in which they have been reared—and to appreciate the freedom which we enjoy. I cannot consent, however, that one rule shall be applied to the imported Celt and another to the home-bred African. The right to freedom is not a question of either race or color, but the common inheritance of humanity. There are no aristocracies in God's providence but that of understanding, which is not transmissible by descent, and which is the appanage of no particular race or class of men. I do not mean to say—for I am no fanatic—that the negro race is, upon the whole, the equal of the white one in this particular, any more than I would affirm that any one white race is equal to any other, or that all the white races are equally fitted for the task of self-government. That is a proposition which no man can confidently affirm, in view of the past history and present condition of the world, but yet it involves no question as to the natural aspirations, which are only inspirations, of man for freedom or his right to its enjoyment. If I am to choose, however, between these two elements, I would take the black man, upon the evidence of the last few years, and reject the equally ignorant white, who is so debauched as even to love slavery—who allows his very instincts to be smothered—and who submits his conscience and his understanding to a direction whose dominion rests upon the same profound and sagacious policy that has locked up the treasures of knowledge from the black man. Everybody must have been struck with the marvelous unanimity with which both these elements arranged themselves, though on opposite sides, in the late contest. When men begin to reason for themselves they are almost sure to differ. "Instinct," says Mr. Burke, "when under the guidance of reason is always right." If it was instinct, however, that led the black man in the one direction, it was something other than reason that herded his jealous rivals into one solid mass in the other.

But it has been objected in some quarters, that if the negro is endowed with the power of the ballot, he will, under the guidance of the same instinct, combine with his fellows to seize the governments of the rebel States into his own hands. This argument is the very opposite of the one which I have just examined, and while the other has only been invented as an apology for refusing the ballot by those who had no fears of the master's influence, has not perhaps been without its weight upon both the northern and the southern mind. Nobody can doubt that in this latitude at least there is a morbid apprehension of what is called negro equality, but really means negro superiority; and it is perhaps not unnatural that now that the negro has shown that he will fight, the men who flinched from that ordeal in the hour of our danger, or even those who have been driven like cattle into the armies of the oligarchy, should dread the comparison, and feel that there was nothing now but the denial of the ballot to prevent the black man from asserting his natural superiority over themselves. This apprehension supposes, however, a power of combination and forecast without even the stimulus of oppression on his part, which is anything but consistent with the idea so studiously inculcated of his incorrigible inferiority, and surrenders all that has been affirmed by philosophers and divines in regard to his normal condition, while it admits that even the higher culture of the white man would give him no advantage in the contest. But in the few cases where the blacks are in a majority the difference in numbers is small. If it cannot be overcome by the superior training of the white man, then the ability of the negro and his consequent title to command, are established by the highest possible test. But in a quarrel of races what is to become of the mulatto? If the least perceptible infusion of negro blood, the very faintest suspicion of a twist in the hair, is sufficient to authorize us to deprive our unfortunate hybrid cousin of all participation in the Government, what assurance is there that the Caucasian flush will not prove equally fatal on the other side? History teaches us that this distinction is as likely to prevail as the other. But surely the chivalry, which has held in subordination by its superior address the turbulent but submissive Democracy of the North, would not shrink from the encounter in the same field with the despised and degraded African. But the idea of such a combination, as the result only of the most generous treatment, is the most extraordinary of paradoxes, if it does not deserve to be characterized as the wildest of chimeras. The people of the South will divide, as before, upon the policy of the Government, and struggle, as before, for the possession of its offices. Both sides, of course, will seek to propitiate the black man because he has become a power in the State, and that one which will secure his confidence, and go farthest in its professions of regard for his interests, will be sure to secure the majority of his votes. If he be a child, as he perhaps in some sense truly is, he will be won by kindness, and ask nothing more than freedom of locomotion, protection to his person, and the means of enjoying, without molestation, the rewards of his own labor. Make it the interest of his late master to cultivate him. Give him a vote, and the "poor white trash" who despised him because he was a slave, will respect him because he is a sovereign. If it is necessary to educate him, because he is ignorant, give him an interest in the Government. It is the only school for the adult, and perhaps the best for all ages. The ripest thinkers of the times are agreed that it is a nursery of instruction that develops the man with wonderful rapidity, and it is this compensatory power that has perhaps served more than anything else to neutralize the evils of the prevailing system. To insist on a preliminary education is to begin at the wrong end. Leave him for instruction in the hands of his old master, and you offer a premium for the continuance of the old system, which kept him in ignorance of his rights and of his power. Knowledge will make him more formidable than ever. So long as he is kept under the State, and feels that he is no part of it, he is sure never to rise by this process. The men who control the Government will have the same interest in keeping him down as heretofore, reinforced as it will be by phantoms of terror that will haunt their pillows, along with the new feeling of resentment and jealousy which their compulsory enfranchisement has engendered. Cherish not the delusion that any good behavior on his part will ever secure for him an admission to the rights of citizenship. It is now or never. There is no case, I think, in history, where a privileged class has ever surrendered its prerogatives to those that were beneath it. Indulge not the hope that you will ever make of him a contented subject. It is as impossible with a people so numerous to maintain an intermediate grade between the slave and citizen, as it is to establish an intermediate variety in nature, or an intermediate condition here between the State and Territory. The black man knows that he is free. If he asserts his right to meet his fellows in council for purposes which touch the interests of his race, either in this world or the next, the rumors of insurrection will load the atmosphere. The white man will restrain his liberty by biting statutes and relentless cruelty. The black man will rebel, and the result will be a chronic war, which will repel the emigrant, and end in the extermination of the weaker race. The groundless panic that pervaded the South so recently foreshadows the evil that is to come. Has the kindred policy of the British Government toward the Celtic Irishman succeeded in conciliating his affection for the English race or nation? If those who favor it here had taken the trouble to look into the causes of that exodus that is unpeopling his ancient home, and flooding our shores with its living tides, they would have discovered that there was something more than a war of races to explain the undying hatred with which the Irish exile looks upon the Saxon Englishman, and they would have found its solution in the very policy which it is now proposed to inaugurate in order to prevent a war of races in the South. It is unnecessary, however, to go so far. The recent bloody disturbances in the island of Jamaica are but a type of the social horrors which a mistaken deference to its prejudices is preparing for that deluded people.

But it is objected by the President that this is a question for the States under the Constitution, and that the concession of the elective franchise by himself to the freedmen of the South must have been extended to all colored men wherever found, and so must have established a change of suffrage in the North as well as in the South, and would have been an assumption of power which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted.

This argument assumes, in the first place, that the defaulting States are already in the Union, free from the penalties of crime, and with all their rights and privileges as intact as those of their loyal sisters. If this be true, it is not to be questioned that the right of fixing the qualifications of their own voters has been left, sub modo, with themselves. But how then, it will be naturally asked, did the President himself acquire the power of defining the qualifications of the voters in the first instance? If he could do this—if he could either abridge or enlarge the privilege—and he could as well do one as the other—so, a multo fortiori, could the law-making power of this Government, in which the sovereignty resides. If he could do either, he might as well have conferred the privilege on the black man as on anybody else. But then he objects that this must have extended it to all the loyal States as well as those that have rebelled, which is an assertion that his jurisdiction has attached, by virtue of the rebellion of the delinquents, to the States that are without sin. I am constrained to say that this is an argument which I have not been able to comprehend. Taking it, however, to be true, as claimed, it must have equally followed from his summary disfranchisement of the voters, whether loyal or disloyal, who might decline to take the oath to support all proclamations and laws having reference to the emancipation of the slave, that we of the loyal States were all disfranchised, too, unless we submitted to the same conditions.

Taking it, however, only in the milder sense of a suggestion, not uncommon in the South, that the loyal States which now deny the suffrage to the black man, would be either expected—to save their own consistency—or might be compelled by Congress to conform to the same rule, there is a word more to be said in the way of answer.

Whether these States could be regarded as strictly republican with such a limitation of the elective franchise, if the necessities of the country or the protection of a numerous class of citizens required the presentation of the question to the consideration of Congress, is more than doubtful. The paucity of the blacks, however, in the northern States, where there is no disposition to oppress them, and their uniform enjoyment, without molestation, of every social and civil right, without the protection of the political privilege of the ballot, has made it a question of no practical importance to the country, and led to no formal complaint, although the overshadowing influence of the slave power has robbed them in many of the States of that privilege which the overthrow of slavery will sooner or later restore to them. Whether their inherent right as citizens to vote could be enforced by an appeal to the judicial tribunals of the country, upon the footing of the constitutional guarantee, is a question which I am not prepared to answer, and do not care to discuss. There is no issue now as to the loyal States to demand the consideration of Congress. There is none pending as to their admission here. It is only the criminals that are at your bar, not asking pardon, but demanding to be restored to power. They went out to found a slave empire. They still think that God and nature intended the negro only for that condition. He counts by millions in the rebel States. He is a freeman now. His master is his enemy. He obviously intends to reenslave him if he can. He wants power to enable him to do it. The negro wants protection, and has earned the right to it, if it was not his before. We want peace and security, if not indemnity for the past, and we are sure that they can be only secured by making these governments republican. They have placed themselves by their own act in a condition in which, by the confession of the President himself, it becomes our duty to execute the guarantees of the Constitution. When we shall have done this work it will be time enough to enter upon another that will be purely voluntary; and if the reconstructed States shall insist, when they are in a condition to do so, that we shall deal with the negro ourselves as we have compelled them to deal with him, I doubt not that the justice of the North, with its vision purged by the rising beams of universal liberty, will anticipate any action here, by undoing what nothing but a base servility to the perished feudalism of the South could ever have accomplished.

But why hurry the return of these States? Why undertake the hopeless and preposterous task of resorting not only to temptation, but compulsion, for the purpose of bringing about a reunion which can only subsist where it is spontaneous, and can rest securely on no other foundation than mutual respect and good will? It is a great problem, and a difficult one. Is there any immediate overshadowing necessity for their reappearance here? Is there any adequate inducement to indemnify us for the admitted risks we must incur from immature and ill-considered action? What would be thought of the sanity of the man in private life who would insist on hurrying back to his embrace and confidence the unfaithful partner who had violated a sworn engagement of fidelity, purloined his goods, fired his dwelling, and murdered a part of its defenders; who instead of yielding had only been surrendered by his slaves, or overtaken and disarmed by the officers of justice, and had never even admitted his crime, or given one token of repentance? Is there not danger enough already in the rapid process of disbandment and surrender that has been going on under our own eyes, to the terror of our only loyal friends, both white and black, in the South, without reference to the wishes or opinions of the people or their Representatives here, and in defiance of official information collected by the Government itself that the spirit which inaugurated and directed this hellish revolt was as ripe as ever in the land, that we should insist on strewing palm-branches in their way, and inviting them to the honors of a triumph at the Capitol? The President admits that his policy "is attended with some risk," but excuses it by the suggestion that "it is a risk that must be taken." This, I humbly think, is a non sequitur. It was not necessary that he should have a policy, and a perilous one, or that we should take the risks that are admitted to be incidental to it. However it may be with the soldier, it is not out of "the nettle danger" that the statesman would "pluck the flower safety." He will take no risks if he can help it, and with only a rational treatment of this question, I think they are unnecessary here. The people of the loyal States, who fought this battle, are now in the possession of the Government. They may—and if they are wise they will—take their own time to determine how they will readjust its machinery, and heal over the wounds that the war has made. It is in their power now to exact every possible security for the future.

Why, then, this inexplicable eagerness to surrender all the advantage of our victory without any security at all? Why insist that the overthrow of these rebels in the bloody arbitrament to which they have appealed, is to be only the signal for their restoration to their former estate? Is it necessary that we should constrain the reluctant condescension of these haughty masters, who so lately spurned us as slaves, to the renewal of the domination which they had come to loathe from a very feeling of satiety? Has the attempt improved or mollified them? General Schurz is the witness that the policy of not only pardoning, but inviting the traitors themselves to reconstruct their States, has had the worst possible effect upon them. And it was but natural that it should. If they do not despise us for our weakness and our voluntary self-abasement, they will be at least prepared to conclude that they are more necessary to us than we are to them. They were not long out themselves, before they began to yearn for the scion of some royal house beyond the seas. Shall we furnish them reason to think that we are pining for the return of our natural lords, along with our Democratic brethren, who have been wandering like sheep without a shepherd, and lamenting the desolation of the Capitol with more than the tenderness of the Moor, who wept the exile of the last of the Abencerrages under the deserted towers of the Alhambra? What reason beyond their mere repugnance to the association with the northern mudsills, will they have to lament their failure in the battlefield, when they are once more reinstated in their original dominion here? Are these the means by which a statesman expects to improve the lessons of the war? If kindness and submission could have won their hearts, they never would have left us. Is anybody weak enough now to think that they are so chastened and humbled by defeat that a restoration to power, instead of intoxicating, would only disarm them? That would not be in accordance with human nature or historical example. Did the catastrophe of Charles I result in any improvement of the family? Their restoration was but the prelude to another revolution that drove them from the throne. It is the same blind confidence in the reformation of these men that is now menacing this Government with ruin.

But is there any evidence that they are changed, or that they are yet in a proper frame of mind to come back and perform faithfully their duties here? We all know better. The special commissioner of the Executive says not, and his testimony is supported by all the presumptions in the case. It would be unreasonable to look for anything else. They are but men, like ourselves. Alienated in affection by a systematic education of thirty years, they went out with the determination never to return. The southern heart went with them. Inflated with pride and vainglory, they threw down the gage of battle, and defied us in the presence of a world that sympathized with them. We took it up, and they are at our feet, deeply wounded in their most sensitive point, smarting under the humiliation of a defeat at the hands of their own slaves, and realizing more than the bitterness of death in the depth of their fall, and the painful recollections that it suggests. How unreasonable to expect that hatred, the deepest and most undying—doubly intensified by such humiliations—could be converted into love by such a process, and the lessons of a generation unlearned in the twinkling of an eye! But they do not even affect it; and I am rather inclined to respect the pride that, under the greatest of temptations, has prevented them from condescending to the meanness of the hypocrite. They confess that they are subdued, but only, as they tell us, by the power of numbers—the mere brute superiority of the North. They do not profess contrition for their great crime. They do not even admit that they have sinned. Nay, they glory in the act, treat fidelity to their infamous confederacy as the most heroic of virtues, award public honors under the very Government that has crushed them—and which that Government ratifies—in recompense for treason against it, and visit the social ban, if not the bullet or the knife, upon such of their people as have fought valiantly in its defense. It is but reasonable, I say, that, coming as they do, out of the fires of the rebellion, they should feel thus. But that they should act thus under our own eye, is evidence either that they do not wish to return, or that the dejection that followed their defeat has given place to the assurance that they are not only to be pardoned their offense, but to return as conquerors. Their leaders certainly do desire to get back again, because they are overthrown in battle, and it is but to exchange the place of a subject for that of a ruler, or at least an equal. To accomplish this they would have been glad to ransom their lives and property for the cheap consideration of negro suffrage. They expected probably no terms more favorable. The lenity of the Government has assured them that treason is no crime, and that there is to be no atonement for the past. The tone of the proclamations and the tenor of the diplomatic negotiations have taught them that nothing was expected or desired by the President but the recognition of the freedom of the slave, and the repudiation of the debt incurred in carrying on the war, and that there was to be no other security for the future. The outgivings of public functionaries have instructed them that they were wrong in claiming the rights of belligerents, and that they have a right to resume their places here upon such conditions as they can make with the Executive. They care nothing about you or your laws. They look only to the Chief Magistrate, while they defy the opinions of your constituents, and regard you only as the mere executors of his will. There is a providence in these manifestations that warns us of our danger if we would give heed to it. Ignoring them, we shall not have even the poor apology of saying that we were deceived in a case where even the largest professions—if they had vouchsafed to make them, as they have not—ought not to have been allowed to put us off our guard. I know that confidence is a generous plant, and that there are natures so unsophisticated as to be above suspicion or distrust. There are men certainly whose boundless charity would not only forgive offenses, however frequently repeated, but even persuade them to give their faith anew to those who have dealt treacherously with them—as these men have with us—while they would reject the counsels of the wise and prudent, on the ground that their suspicions were ungenerous, and the results apprehended by them improbable. These men may be good Christians, but they are poor statesmen, and they misconstrue the spirit of the Christian maxim which teaches forgiveness, if they suppose that it inculcates trust. The thing that has once happened may happen again. It is not sufficient that it is improbable. It is the business of the statesman to see that it is made impossible. No blind confidence, no false sense of security on his own part, will excuse him for hazarding the peace and welfare of a nation by giving his trust a second time where it has once been disastrously betrayed. He has no right to sport in this way with the life of a people. He cannot afford to be thus generous with other people's goods. It is not enough to tell us that the present Executive of this nation—with a strong feeling, of course, for the desolation of the South—is magnanimous enough to forgive, and generous enough to confide in the honor and loyalty of his old neighbors and associates in council, although they have so cruelly persecuted him—as they will do again as soon as the opportunity occurs. The twenty millions of the loyal States who have seen so little good come out of that Nazareth, must have something surer to rest upon than his oblivious charity. I think otherwise, and so do my constituents. I have great respect for his opinions, but the facts and the presumptions are all against him, and I must be governed by them. If we are wrong, the error may be corrected hereafter. If he is wrong, it is irremediable. True wisdom demands that we should "make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond of fate," while there is yet time to do it, by providing against all possible contingencies, where the interests involved are so vast and inappreciable. If the terms seem harsh, that is the fault of those who are precipitating the solution. A reasonable probation would enable us to make them easier. I would rather, for my own part, trust to the mellowing influences of time. If you desire a reunion that will be permanent and real, you must wait till their hearts are changed—wait until the bitterness of defeat is past, and until they are prepared to confess their errors, and ask forgiveness, and restoration in the spirit of the returning prodigal. Without repentance forgiveness is idle, and restoration worse. Philosophy and religion alike approve the soundness of this doctrine. You cannot accomplish a task of this sort by any forcing process. No wise Government would think of it. No sound or judicious statesman would advise it. If they cannot come back now in the right spirit, and will not come with such securities as we have a right to demand, it were better they should not come at all. I would hold them as they are—and with black troops too—until their territories are peopled by men who will recognize the value of the Union—ay, hold them forever, if necessary, as subject provinces. But it will not be necessary. They will be glad to return in a very few years on just such conditions as you may impose, and will be grateful for the privilege. Admit them now, and withdraw your armies, and you leave your few white friends and your multitudinous black ones to an ostracism as merciless as the bloody proscription upon which they can no longer venture with safety. They tell you so themselves. While the President informs you that these States, or some of them, are ready to return, in the face of the admitted fact that their people, in almost every instance, have refused to ratify even the advantageous bargain made with him by their leaders, by sending loyal men to represent them here, every breeze from the South is laden with the earnest remonstrances of the loyal people of those States, telling you that the withdrawal of your power will be the signal for their flight and exile from their homes and altars, from the graves of their kindred and their household gods, and beseeching you, in piteous accents of despair and agony, not to abandon them to their remorseless enemies.

But before they do come in, whether by the door or window, there are duties to be performed to others, dangers against which we must provide, arising out of the obligations of the war that these men have forced upon us. We have incurred an enormous debt that is mainly owing to our own people. We must provide for the payment of its interest, as well as the redemption of all the pledges we have made to the disabled soldier, and to the widows and orphans of those who have perished in the field. Is it expected that these men will assist us in redeeming these obligations, that some persons are so anxious to associate them with us in the performance of this work of justice and mercy? Do you propose to summon these great criminals here and translate them from the dock to the bench, as joint assessors with yourselves, and those who have poured out their money or their blood in ocean streams in bringing them to justice, in the resettlement of the nation, in perfecting its securities, and in fulfilling the obligations you have incurred to the public creditor, and to the families of those brave men who have gone down to death upon so many southern battle-fields? Will you insist that they shall come into council with you on such a question as this? The ordeal would be too severe. They have denounced the war as not only unrighteous, but unlawful; and they are not alone in this particular. It is not the rebels militant only, the men who so cheerfully staked their lives on their opinions, who think so. Their old associates in the North, who want them back on the terms of the President, have taught their followers here upon the same argument, that the public securities were worthless and would be repudiated. Is there no risk of a new coalition on this basis? I venture to predict that the next phase of the reunited Democracy of the North and South, (for it will be a reunion of the party and not of the States,) will be opposition to the payment of this debt. It may not discover itself at once in the shape of absolute repudiation in the North, but this new alliance will find other means, not less effective, to accomplish its work. The South, with all its prejudices and pride, would rather consent even to negro suffrage than allow itself to be taxed for such a purpose, and you cannot compel it without the aid of the black man. The North will insist, at least, on scaling your securities down by the actual money value in the world's market of the paper that was invested in them. It will damage your credit by quarreling with your schemes of revenue. Knowing that taxation is always unpopular, and particularly among a people so unused to it as ourselves, it will at least flatter and delude the multitude with illusory promises of relief, and with the aid of a united South, will, at the next turn of the cards, win its way back to power, and enter once more upon the possession of the Government.

But the mischief will not end here. There is another debt that numbers cannot compute, incurred in the baffled attempt to overthrow this Union, and diffused throughout the entire South. There is, besides, a claim yet dormant for the value of the slaves made free by the proclamation. It may seem to some extravagant to talk of these, but it is no more extravagant than many other things that we have witnessed, and among them the assertion of a right to return to these Halls as though they had not sinned, and the presumptuous arrogance that has already taken our Constitution in charge, and undertaken to arraign our acts of self-defense against their treason as violations of that instrument. Admit these men, ignore their crimes by your votes here, give them your confidence and the eventual mastery as before, and your public credit will deservedly receive a shock that will tumble it into ruins. Re-admit them here, and every prudent man will endeavor to get rid of your securities. No sharp-sighted money-lender will trust a Government so administered. It will be in vain for you to profess in joint resolutions that you do not intend to pay any of the debt of the dead confederacy, or of the claims of the living slaveholder. The world will not believe it. It will say you mock it, when the makers of that debt, and the disloyal slaveholder himself, shall be exalted by your votes into legislators, to cooperate with the party here that has decied your obligations, and declared them to be worthless. The assumption by you of the one, and the payment of the other, would be but a logical sequence. If the makers of that debt are decided to be worthy of honor and trust in this Government, it will be an estoppel against the assertion that there was anything essentially immoral in hiring assassins to take our lives, or anything in reason to prevent the payment of the wages of their iniquity. It will be taken for granted that when you make a legislator of the criminal, you intend to pay his debts of honor at home. You may protest that you do not, but it will point you to these acts, and scoff, ay, it will scoff, at your empty protestations, as no more than sounding brass and tinkling cymbals.

But before I have done, allow me to come back once more to the great conflict of power—the gigantic and overshadowing issue which has been forced on us and on the country, by the process of restoration which it has pleased the President in the exercise of his own judgment to adopt. There are other considerations that demand our care beyond the mere rehabilitation of the conquered States. It is for us to see that in the execution of the guarantee the Federal Republic itself shall receive no detriment, and undergo no change. There are symptoms unquestionably of an alarming nature, developed, of course, by the high stimulus under which it has just been working, that forebode a serious disturbance of its balances—a revolution equivalent to a change in its organic structure, if not watched narrowly before it is too late. The time has now come to check those tendencies which a condition so unnatural has so largely encouraged. With a Union newly and doubly imperiled by a policy that, ignoring the sentiment of the loyal States, has thrust us an immeasurable distance back from the position which we occupied when the camp-fires of our legions were blazing along the heights of the Appomattox, by not only leaving treason and murder to go unpunished, but warming the former into life and hope and strength by withdrawing our troops, and endowing it with the power of reorganizing its broken columns for a fresh assault, and with the great problem of the restoration of its dissevered members complicated with another and perhaps a greater, in the tremendous question whether all these heterogeneous elements are to be flung into the crucible, and fused down under the fierce flames of war into an elective monarchy, it seems to me, with all due respect to the President, that we have reached a crisis in our affairs when it behooves the people to look to their securities, and their Representatives here to resume the government of this nation, and to say to the advancing tide "thus far and no further."

Standing as I do upon the traditions of the fathers, upon the radical but conservative maxims of republican liberty, upon the great principles that have been consecrated by the struggles of more than two hundred years, I cannot but tremble for my country when, in addition to all this, I hear the national Representatives instructed by other than their lawful masters in regard to their duties here; when I find myself semi-officially advised by the executive head, who has just been thanked by a rebel Legislature for the act, that amendments to its fundamental law, proposed by its delegates here for its security, are unnecessary, or inadmissible, or entitled to no more respect than the resolutions of a town meeting, while bills that have passed this House, and are now actually depending in the Senate, are made the subject of public discourse and animadversion at the other end of the avenue; when I hear a high officer of that department confessing and justifying the exercise of a dispensing power over our laws, in the employment of traitors and the payment to them of moneys wrung from the sweat of the toiling millions of the loyal North; when I see members of both these Houses ready and anxious at such a time to abdicate their rightful power as a Legislature, not by a harmless reference to a committee of their own bodies, but by championing their own disability, and flinging down their crowns at the footstool of executive power; when I hear on this floor, from men who opposed the war throughout, and now, by a logic which I do not question, support the policy that gives the victory to the enemy, the appeal of the people to their own Congress compared to the howls of a drunken populace at the doors of the revolutionary Assembly of France, that in the name of liberty flooded its capital with blood, and in the name of religion dethroned the monarch of the world; when I read in newspapers controlled by gentlemen of this House who have discerned no sensibility to attacks upon its own privileges, the mere assertion of a right on its part to express an opinion in regard to the disposition of our troops, with no organized enemy in the field, denounced as an invasion of the prerogative; when I hear even the suggestion of the nation's sentiment in regard to the appropriate doom of the traitor chiefs, who now stand impeached before the world of a connivance in the starvation of our soldiers, and the butchery of our President, reprobated in the same way by public journals in the confidence of the Government; and when, to crown all, my own vision is blasted by appeals to the Executive from the disloyal papers of the North, to employ that patronage which the loyal people have alone bestowed on him to coerce their Representatives into submission to his views, and, failing that, to enact the rôle of another Cromwell or Napoleon in this Capitol, while an answering shout comes back upon the southern breeze that the bayonets of the soldiery, who flung that despotism to the earth must be invoked to re-instate it here. I think I am no alarmist. I am not apt to indulge in gloomy auguries in regard to the future of a nation that has outlived so many blunders, and been so often ransomed by an Almighty arm. The proverbial honors of a prophet of evil have no attractions for me. Poesy has told us the story of Cassandra. History has vouchsafed to hand down to us the name and fate of the madman who ran up and down the streets of Jerusalem crying "Woe! woe!" while the armies of Titus were encamped about its walls. But if I stood alone on this floor, and it were my last utterance, holding the high trust which God had given me, with a nation in travail, and in view of the dark portents that cloud the horizon, and shake the very atmosphere around us, I would say to the people, "Awake from your false security, or prepare yourselves for another holocaust. Your enemy still lives. His 'impaired vitality' has been restored. Red-handed treason rears its head as proudly and defiantly and insultingly as before. It menaces your capital. It claims to dictate to your President. It presumes to use the very organs of your Government to denounce your attitude as a revolutionary one, and to arraign your servants here as though they were in rebellion against the South. It moves upon the citadel where your defenders are intrenched. See that no warder sleeps, no port is left unguarded. Look to it that no sentinel unbars your gates. Steel the hearts of your defenders against the weakness that would betray like treason. See that their mail is proof—no joint agape, no rivet out of place. See that no Trojan horse, no Tennessee with fair outside, but big with 'pestilence and war,' shall win its way within your walls. When these great criminals do return, if ever, let it be only through the door that you shall indicate, and with such infrangible and irreversible securities as you only have the right to demand." This is my position. Here I have taken my stand, and by the help of God I will maintain it to the end. Others may falter in the trial, but through me no right shall be abridged, no privilege surrendered, no single leaf plucked, no jewel torn from the crown of the representative body.

On motion of Mr. COOK, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned till Monday.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 12, 1866.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.:

O Supreme Ruler of the heavens and the earth, behold the nation prostrate at Thy feet at the terrible calamity, the staggering blow, the great bereavement. The scenes connected with the death of our lamented Chief Magistrate come back to the memory to-day. O God, we bless Thee for such a man, for such a President, that his life was spared so long, that he was permitted to accomplish so much, that when he died he fell covered with honors and glory, and not the nation only gathered about his bier, but messages of condolence were sent from all the nations of the earth. We pray that to-day we may be sufficiently humbled and chastened in view of our great affliction, and that we may be led as a nation to depend less upon man and more upon God. And wilt Thou sanctify to us all the afflictions, as individuals and as a people, that we are called to experience. To-day, especially, would we commend to Thy merciful regard the afflicted and bereaved family of our departed chief. May they continue to be supported by Thy grace, be guided by Thy Spirit, and be preserved in Thy mercy, that these great afflictions be sanctified to their present and future good. And bless our Government, the President of the United States, the ministers of state, the members of Congress, the defenders of our land, and all the people. Bless us, we pray Thee, in our relations to each other and to Thee, our Maker and Preserver. Prepare us for the solemn services in which we are about to engage. Oh, grant that we may look up submissively to Thee, remembering that God does all things well. And we pray that, being chastened by Thine afflictions, we may be better prepared as a nation for the great mission we have to perform in the world. Make us a blessing and make us an example to the nations of the earth of righteousness and truth and freedom, and save us at last, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first business in order is the reading of the Journal of the last day's session.

Mr. CLARK. Unless some Senator desires to have it read, I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the Journal can be dispensed with only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I notice in the published order of proceedings that provision is made for the reading of the Journal; and I do not know but that it was for the purpose of consuming some time to enable the necessary preparation to be made in the other House. I have no desire to have the Journal read, but the programme ought to be observed.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that the Journal of the other House is a very short one, and probably its reading has been concluded by this time, so that they are ready to receive us.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that understanding, I have no objection to the Senator's motion.

There being no objection made, the reading of the Journal of last Friday's proceedings was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In pursuance of previous arrangement, the Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to join in the services which have been assigned for this day.

The Senate, headed by the President pro tempore and the Chief Clerk, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives. At the conclusion of the services there, the Senate returned to its Chamber.

PRINTING OF MR. BANCROFT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. FOOT. I suggest to Senators—I suppose there is no business to detain us—that in a few moments a concurrent resolution will be received from the House of Representatives, and I trust Senators will remain until that resolution shall arrive; it will require our action in its concurrence. Meanwhile I move—the Secretary can put it in the proper form of a resolution—that ten thousand copies of Mr. Bancroft's memorial address on the life and character of President Lincoln be printed for the use of the Senate. That resolution will go, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, such a resolution will be drawn, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FOOT. If there be no objection, that rule may be waived, and the resolution adopted at this time; and if there be no objection, I trust the Chair will put the question on the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule it is required that such a resolution should go to the Committee on Printing; but by the common consent of the Senate the Chair will put the question to the Senate.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously, as follows:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the memorial address on the life and character of Abraham Lincoln, delivered at the request of both Houses of Congress, by Hon. George Bancroft, be printed for the use of the Senate.

JOURNAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. We might as well have the Journal read now. It was not read this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the Journal of Friday's proceedings is called for. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. McDUGALL. There is objection. It was dispensed with by unanimous consent this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. We may as well have it read. It will fill up the time while we are waiting to receive the message from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the Journal will be proceeded with, if there be no objection.

The Journal of Friday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of Lieutenant Commander Greenleaf Cilley be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MR. BANCROFT'S ADDRESS.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to communicate to the Senate a concurrent resolution presenting the thanks of Congress to Hon. George Bancroft for the appropriate memorial address delivered by him on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, and requesting a copy for publication.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider that resolution at the present time, and move the concurrence of the Senate in it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent. It is as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the thanks of Congress be presented to Hon. George Bancroft for the appropriate memorial address delivered by him on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, in the Representatives' Hall, before both Houses of Congress and their invited guests, on the 12th day of February, 1866, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication.

Resolved, That the chairmen of the joint committee appointed to make the necessary arrangements to carry into effect the resolution of this Congress in relation to the memorial exercises of Abraham Lincoln, be requested to communicate to Mr. Bancroft the foregoing resolution, receive his answer thereto, and present the same to both Houses of Congress.

The resolutions were concurred in.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 12, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON, as follows:

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. We thank Thee that once more through the night watches we were safely guarded by Thee, and that our eyes have been opened in peace through Thy love to behold the coming of this gladly solemn day. And now that we are to be called away from the usual public duties of the positions that are occupied here to hold converse awhile with death and with the memories of one whom we all honored and loved so much, we beseech Thee, O God, that in Thine infinite mercy Thou wilt grant us all grace to profit as we should by the occasion. We turn away from all relations of a public nature, to country and to time, to think of those more solemn ones that we bear to eternity and to God. May every one be induced by Thy Holy Spirit to consider to-day what the tendency of life is—whether through faith in Jesus Christ it will end in everlasting life. O Lord, prepare all for the proper observance of this solemn day. May every one interested, and all who may participate in this service, be guided of God, so that all being done decently and in order, this magnificent and solemn testimonial of the nation to the worth of our departed and murdered President may make a due impression on the national heart.

And when all is over here, when all the pomp and the pride and the pageantries of earth have passed away, may we all be received into Thy heavenly kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of Saturday last was then read and approved.

CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested by the president and officers of the Christian Commission to tender their thanks to this House for the use of this Hall on their four anniversary occasions.

MEMORIAL OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

To-day had been selected for services to commemorate the life and death of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, in accordance with the following concurrent resolutions reported from the select joint committee appointed to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of their late President, Abraham Lincoln, and adopted unanimously by the two Houses of Congress:

Whereas the melancholy event of the violent and tragic death of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, having occurred during the recess of Congress, and the two Houses sharing in the general grief and desiring to manifest their sensibility upon the occasion of the public bereavement: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring, That the two Houses of Congress will assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives, on Monday, the 12th day of February next, that being his anniversary birthday, at the hour of twelve meridian, and that, in the presence of the two Houses there assembled, an address upon the life and character of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, be pronounced by Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, and that the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be requested to invite the President of the United States, the heads of the several Departments, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the representatives of foreign Governments near this Government, and such officers of the Army and Navy as have received the thanks of Congress who may then be at the seat of Government, to be present on the occasion.*

And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. Lincoln, and to assure her of the profound sympathy of the two Houses of Congress for her deep personal affliction, and of their sincere condolence for the late national bereavement.

The Speaker's desk, and the desk of the Clerk of the House, which was to be occupied by the orator of the day, were draped in mourning.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 12, 1866.

SIR: I make my acknowledgment for the honor of the invitation which, in execution of a concurrent resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, you have transmitted me to attend the exercises in honor of the memory of the late President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln.

It is with sincere regret that I find the state of my health is such as to forbid my attendance upon those very interesting national ceremonies.

I have the honor to be, sir, your very obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

At twelve o'clock and ten minutes p. m., the members of the Senate, following their President pro tempore and their Secretary, and preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms, entered the Hall of the House of Representatives and occupied the seats reserved for them on the right and left of the main aisle.

Shortly afterward the President of the United States, with the members of his Cabinet, entered the Hall and occupied seats, the President in front of the Speaker's table, and his Cabinet immediately on his right.

Immediately after the entrance of the President, the Chief Justice and the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States entered the Hall and occupied seats next to the President, on the right of the Speaker's table.

The others present were seated as follows:

The Heads of Departments, with the Diplomatic Corps, next to the President, on the left of the Speaker's table;

Officers of the Army and Navy, who, by name, have received the thanks of Congress, next to the Supreme Court, on the right of the Speaker's table;

Assistant Heads of Departments, Governors of States and Territories, and the Mayors of Washington and Georgetown, directly in the rear of the Heads of Departments;

The Chief Justice and Judges of the Court of Claims, and the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, directly in the rear of the Supreme Court;

The Heads of Bureaus in the Departments, directly in the rear of the officers of the Army and Navy;

Representatives on either side of the Hall, in the rear of those invited, four rows of seats on either side of the main aisles being reserved for Senators;

The Orator of the day, Hon. George Bancroft, at the table of the Clerk of the House;

The Chairman of the Joint Committee of Arrangements, at the right and left of the orator, and next to them the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House;

The other officers of the Senate and of the House, on the floor at the right and the left of the Speaker's platform.

When order was restored, at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m., the Marine band, stationed in the vestibule, played appropriate dirges.

At twelve o'clock and thirty minutes the two Houses were called to order by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Rev. Dr. BORNHORN, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou who dost inhabit eternity, while we appear but for a little moment and then vanish away, we adore Thy eternal name. Almighty God, wonderful in power, full of majesty art Thou, and before Thee all earthly distinctions vanish into nothing. We come into Thy presence to-day, O God, simply as men, fallen men, condemned alike by Thy law, and rightfully cut off through sin from all communion with God. But through Thy infinite goodness a new and living way of access has been opened through Thy Son, consecrated by His blood. We present ourselves in that better name, and plead Thy promises of pardon and acceptance, through faith in Him.

We are reminded, O God, by the imposing solemnities of this scene, of that hour when the nation heard, and shuddered at the hearing of it, that Abraham Lincoln was dead—was murdered. And we bow afresh submissively unto Him who ordered for the nation that solemn hour; we bow ourselves unto the blow that fell on this whole people in the very hour of their triumph and hushed all their shouts of victory to the voiceless silence of woe. O God, we feel that the shadow of that death has not passed away from the national heart, as this solemn gathering testifies full well. Yet we know that the gloom that falls on our hearts from this drapery of woe is gilded by the glory of a great triumph, and by the light of the memory of the illustrious dead. Still, O God, may we all of us learn the solemn lesson which Thou dost intend to convey unto us. "Be ye also ready, for ye know not the day nor the hour when the Son of Man cometh." "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

We worship Thee as the God of our fathers. Thou didst mark out a path for them over the trackless seas, and didst bring them to these shores, bearing with them the seeds of a great dominion. We thank Thee that Thou didst so protect it and cherish it that it spread itself rapidly outward and over the breadth of a continent, bearing with it Christian freedom, churches, schools, intelligence, and all the blessings of a Christian civilization. We thank Thee, O God, that the power of Thy love in its unfolding was a resistless one, because backed by Thy eternal counsels and by Thy Almighty power. And because the might of God was in it we have seen it in its progress sweeping all obstacles away, crushing great systems and great parties, reforming public opinion, and advancing to the control of a continent.

And we bless Thee, O God, that in every hour of its peril heretofore Thou hast raised up for it heroic defenders. We thank Thee, O defender of Israel, that when treason was hatching its plot and massing its armies, then, O God of our fathers, Thou who didst of old bring David from the sheepfolds didst also bring one from the humble cabin of the pioneer to become the chieftain of this great people in their hour of danger, to shield them from disaster, and lead them to final triumph. We thank Thee that Thou didst give us an honest man; a man simple-hearted, loving as a child, and yet of rugged strength, who wanted only culture and discipline; and that discipline Thou didst grant unto him through stern public trial, through bitter domestic sorrow, through the wonderful leadings of Thy providence, until the mere politician was overshadowed by the nobler growth of his moral and spiritual nature; until he came, as we believe, into communion with Christ; until he saw that our cause would prosper only by justice; and then, inspired by Thee, he uttered those words of power that changed three million slaves into men—the one act that has made his name illustrious forever.

We thank Thee, O God, that he did not die until he was assured of victory, until he had received all honor that earth could bestow; and then we believe Thou didst give him a martyr's crown. We thank Thee, O God, that we have this hope for our illustrious dead. We have great reason to bless Thee that the enduring strength of our institutions was such that they suffered no perceptible shock, even by the death of such a man, and at such a time.

And we thank Thee that Thou didst provide for us in that hour one who was strong enough to receive, and to bear steadily, the weight of Government. And we beseech Thee, O God, to give him strength and wisdom, so that he may work out this great problem to its solemn solution, and by universal freedom and equal right and equal law bind this whole people into one inseparable nation.

We thank Thee, O God, that the representatives of the nation have seen fit to come together to-day, and sit for awhile in the shadow of Abraham Lincoln's grave. O God, may they reconsecrate themselves to the principles and to the work which have caused him to be remembered and honored thus. And then, when that great work is accomplished, a disenthralled and regenerated land will be the fitting monument both for him and for them.

We beseech Thee, O God, to remember with a special mercy the President of the United States, and to grant him the wisdom and strength which he needs for the solemn responsibilities of his position. God grant that he may so live that a nation's sorrow shall be expressed when God shall call him, as he will all of us, home.

We pray Thee to bless all his Cabinet advisers. Bless, we beseech Thee, the legislators of the land. Remember the officers of the Army and of the Navy, illustrious as Thou hast made them, through whose courage and skill the great triumph was won. Remember our soldiers and sailors. Bless the whole people. Bless those who are struggling yet onward to a perfect manhood.

Remember those eminent men, the honored representatives of foreign Powers, who have come here to testify with us their respect for one who was honored abroad as well as at home. Remember their sovereigns, and the Governments that they represent. We thank Thee, O God, that they and we are all at peace. May that peace continue until the nations shall learn war no more.

And remember, O God, that bereaved woman, sitting in the desolation of her widowhood to-day. And bless the family in its sore bereavement; may they all be comforted by the thought how much the husband and the father is loved and honored still.

Remember, O God, the distinguished orator on this occasion. We pray Thee that Thou wilt give him to utter words of power and truth to-day, that shall make a deep and due impression on the heart and the mind of the nation.

May we, O God, all of us so live that when we have finished our course here, it may be with exceeding joy, through Jesus Christ, our Lord; to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Spirit, we ascribe all praise and honor, now and forever. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate, in introducing the orator of the day, said:

No ordinary occasion could have convened this august assemblage. For four weary years the storm of war, of civil war, raged fiercely over our country. The blood of the best and bravest of her sons was freely shed to preserve her name and place among the nations of the earth. In April last the dark clouds which had so long hung heavily and gloomily over our heads were all dispersed, and the light of peace, more welcome even than the vernal sunshine, gladdened the eyes and the hearts of our people. Shouts of joy and songs of triumph echoed through the land. The hearts of the devout poured themselves in orisons and thanksgivings to the God of battles and of nations, that the most wicked and most formidable rebellion ever known in human history had been effectually crushed and our country saved.

In the midst of all this abounding joy, suddenly and swiftly as the lightning's flash, came the fearful tidings that the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, our President, loved and honored as few men ever were, so honest, so faithful, so true to his duty and his country, had been foully murdered, had fallen by the bullet of an assassin. All hearts were stricken with horror. The transition from extreme joy to profound sorrow was never more sudden and universal. Had it been possible for a stranger, ignorant of the truth, to look over our land, he would have supposed that there had come upon us some visitation of the Almighty not less dreadful than that which once fell on ancient Egypt on that fearful night when there was not a house where there was not one dead. The nation wept for him.

After being gazed upon by myriads of loving eyes, under the dome of this magnificent Capitol, the remains of our President were borne in solemn procession through our cities, towns, and villages, all draped in the habiliments of sorrow, the symbols and tokens of profound and heartfelt grief, to their final resting-place in the capital of his own State. There he sleeps, peacefully embalméd in the tears of his countrymen.

The Senate and House of Representatives of the United States have deemed it proper to commemorate this tragic event by appropriate services. This day, the birthday of him whom we mourn, has properly been selected. An eminent citizen, distinguished by his labors and services in high and responsible public positions at home and abroad—whose pen has instructed the present age in the history of his country, and done much to transmit the fame and renown of that country to future ages—Hon. George Bancroft—will now deliver a discourse.

Mr. BANCROFT (who, on coming forward, was greeted with warm demonstrations of applause) then proceeded to deliver the following

ORATION.

Senators, Representatives, of America:

That God rules in the affairs of men is as certain as any truth of physical science. On the great moving Power which is from the beginning hangs the world of the senses and the world of thought and action. Eternal wisdom marshals the great procession of the nations, working in patient continuity through the ages, never halting and never abrupt, encompassing all events in its oversight, and ever effecting its will, though mortals may slumber in apathy or oppose with madness. Kings are lifted up or thrown down, nations come and go, republics flourish and wither, dynasties pass away like a tale that is told; but nothing is by chance, though men in their ignorance of causes may think so. The deeds of time are governed, as well as judged, by the decrees of eternity. The caprice of fleeting existences bends to the immovable Omnipotence, which plants its foot on all the centuries and has neither change of purpose nor repose. Sometimes, like a messenger through the thick darkness of night, it steps along mysterious ways; but when the hour strikes for a people, or for mankind, to pass into a new form of being, unseen hands draw the bolts from the gates of futurity; an all-subduing influence prepares the minds of men for the coming revolution; those who plan resistance find themselves in conflict with the will of Providence, rather than with human devices; and all hearts and all understandings, most of all the opinions and influences of the unwilling, are wonderfully attracted and compelled to bear forward the change which becomes more an obedience to the law of universal nature than submission to the arbitrament of man.

GROWTH OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.

In the fullness of time a republic rose up in the wilderness of America. Thousand of years had passed away before this child of the ages could be born. From whatever there was of good in the systems of former centuries she drew her nourishment; the wrecks of the past were her warnings. With the deepest sentiment of faith fixed in her inmost nature, she disenthralled religion from bondage to temporal power, that her worship might be worship only in spirit and in truth. The wisdom which had passed from India through Greece, with what Greece had added of her own; the jurisprudence of Rome; the mediæval municipalities; the Teutonic method of representation; the political experience of England; the benignant wisdom of the expositors of the law of nature and of nations in France and Holland, all shed on her their selectest influence. She washed the gold of political wisdom from the sands wherever it was found; she cleft it from the rocks; she gleaned it among ruins. Out of all the discoveries of statesmen and sages, out of all the experience of past human life, she compiled a perennial political philosophy, the primordial principles of national ethics. The wise men of Europe sought the best Government in a mixture of monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy; and America went behind these names to extract from them the vital elements of social forms, and blend them harmoniously in the free commonwealth, which comes nearest to the illustration of the natural quality of all men. She intrusted the guardianship of established rights to law; the movements of reform to the spirit of the people, and drew her force from the happy reconciliation of both.

TERRITORIAL EXTENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

Republics had heretofore been limited to small cantons or cities and their dependencies; America, doing that of which the like had not before been known upon the earth, or believed by kings and statesmen to be possible, extended her republic across a continent. Under her auspices the vine of liberty took deep root and filled the land; the hills were covered with its shadow; its boughs were like the goodly cedars, and reached unto both oceans. The fame of this only daughter of freedom went out into all the lands of the earth; from her the human race drew hope.

PROPHECIES ON THE CONSEQUENCES OF SLAVERY.

Neither hereditary monarchy nor hereditary aristocracy planted itself on our soil; the only hereditary condition that fastened itself upon us was servitude. Nature works in sincerity, and is ever true to its law. The bee hives honey, the viper distills poison; the vine stores its juices, and so do the poppy and the opium. In like manner, every thought and every action ripens its seed, each in its kind. In the individual man, and still more in a nation, a just idea gives life and progress and glory; a false conception portends disaster, shame, and death. A hundred and twenty years ago, a West Jersey Quaker wrote: "This trade of importing slaves is dark gloominess hanging over the land; the consequences will be grievous to posterity." At the North the growth of slavery was arrested by natural causes; in the region nearest the tropics it thrived rankly, and worked itself into the organism of the rising States. Virginia stood between the two; with soil and climate, and resources demanding free labor, yet capable of the profitable employment of the slave. She was the land of great statesmen; and they saw the danger of her being whelmed under the rising flood in time to struggle against the delusions of avarice and pride. Ninety-four years ago the Legislature of Virginia addressed the British king, saying that the trade in slaves was "of great inhumanity," was opposed to the "security and happiness" of their constituents, "would in time have the most destructive influence," and "endanger their very existence." And the king answered them, that "upon pain of his highest displeasure, the importation of slaves should not be in any respect obstructed." "Pharisaical Britain," wrote Franklin in behalf of Virginia, "to pride itself in setting free a single slave that happened to land on thy coasts, while thy laws continue a traffic whereby so many hundreds of thousands are dragged into a slavery that is entailed on their posterity." "A serious view of this subject," said Patrick Henry in 1773, "gives a gloomy prospect to future times." In the same year George Mason wrote to the Legislature of Virginia, "The laws of impartial Providence may avenge our injustice upon our posterity." Conforming his conduct to his convictions, in Virginia, and in the Continental Congress, Jefferson, with the approval of Edmund Pendleton, branded the slave trade as piracy; and he fixed in the Declaration of Independence as the corner-stone of America, "All men are created equal, with an unalienable right to liberty." On the first organization of temporary governments for the continental domain, Jefferson, but for the default of New Jersey, would, in 1784, have consecrated every part of that territory to freedom. In the formation of the national Constitution Virginia, opposed by a part of New England, vainly struggled to abolish the slave trade at once and forever; and when the Ordinance of 1787 was introduced by Nathan Dane, without the clause prohibiting slavery, it was through the favorable disposition of Virginia and the South that the clause of Jefferson was restored, and the whole northwestern territory—all the territory that then belonged to the nation—was reserved for the labor of freemen.

DESPAIR OF THE MEN OF THE REVOLUTION.

The hope prevailed in Virginia that the abolition of the slave trade would bring with it the gradual abolition of slavery; but the expectation was doomed to disappointment. In supporting incipient measures for emancipation, Jefferson encountered difficulties greater than he could overcome; and after vain wrestlings, the words that broke from him, "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, that His justice cannot sleep forever," were words of despair. It was the desire of Washington's heart that Virginia should remove slavery by a public act; and as the prospects of a general emancipation grew more and more dim he, in utter hopelessness of the action of the State, did all that he could by bequeathing freedom to his own slaves. Good and true men had, from the days of 1776, proposed to colonize the negro in the home of his ancestors. But the idea of colonization was thought to increase the difficulty of emancipation; and in spite of strong support, while it accomplished much good for Africa, it proved impracticable as a remedy at home. Madison, who in early life disliked slavery so much that he wished "to depend as little as possible on the labor of slaves;" Madison, who held that where slavery exists "the republican theory becomes fallacious;" Madison, who in the last years of his life would not consent to the annexation of Texas, lest his countrymen should fill it with slaves; Madison, who said "slavery is the greatest evil under which the nation labors, a portentous evil—an evil, moral, political, and economical—a sad blot on our free country," went mournfully into old age with the cheerless words, "No satisfactory plan has yet been devised for taking out the stain."

NEW VIEWS OF SLAVERY.

The men of the Revolution passed away. A new generation sprang up, impatient that an institution to which they clung should be condemned as inhuman, unwise, and unjust; in the throes of discontent at the self-reproach of their fathers, and blinded by the luster of wealth to be acquired by the culture of a new staple, they devised the theory that slavery, which they would not abolish, was not evil, but good. They turned on the friends of colonization, and confidently demanded, "Why take black men from a civilized and Christian country, where their labor is a source of immense gain, and a power to control the markets of the world, and send them to a land of ignorance, idolatry, and indolence, which was the home of their forefathers, but not theirs? Slavery is a blessing. Were they not in their ancestral land naked, scarcely lifted above brutes, ignorant of the course of the sun, controlled by nature? And in their new abode have they not been taught to know the difference of the seasons, to plow and plant and reap, to drive oxen, to tame the horse, to exchange their scanty dialect for the richest of all the languages among men, and the stupid adoration of follies for the purest religion? And since slavery is good for the blacks, it is good for their masters, bringing opulence and the opportunity of educating a race. The slavery of the black is good in itself; he shall serve the white man forever." And nature, which better understood the quality of fleeting interest and passion, laughed, as it caught the echo, "man" and "forever!"

SLAVERY AT HOME.

A regular development of pretensions followed the new declaration with logical consistency. Under the old declaration every one of the States had retained, each for itself, the right of manumitting all slaves by an ordinary act of legislation; now, the power of the people over servitude through their Legislatures was curtailed, and the privileged class was swift in imposing legal and constitutional obstructions on the people themselves. The power of emancipation was narrowed or taken away. The slave might not be disquieted by education. There remained an unconfessed consciousness that the system of bondage was wrong, and a restless memory that it was at variance with the true American tradition; its safety was therefore to be secured by political organization. The generation that made the Constitution took care for the predominance of freedom in Congress, by the Ordinance of Jefferson; the new school aspired to secure for slavery an equality of votes in the Senate; and while it hinted at an organic act that should concede to the collective South a veto power on national legislation, it assumed that each State separately had the right to revise and nullify laws of the United States, according to the discretion of its judgment.

SLAVERY AND FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The new theory hung as a bias on the foreign relations of the country; there could be no recognition of Hayti, nor even of the American colony of Liberia; and the world was given to understand that the establishment of free labor in Cuba would be a reason for wresting that island from Spain. Territories were annexed—Louisiana, Florida, Texas, half of Mexico; slavery must have its share in them all, and it accepted for a time a dividing line between the unquestioned domain of free labor and that in which involuntary labor was to be tolerated. A few years passed away, and the new school, strong and arrogant, demanded and received an apology for applying the Jefferson proviso to Oregon.

SQUATTER SOVEREIGNTY.

The application of that proviso was interrupted for three Administrations; but justice moved steadily onward. In the news that the men of California had chosen freedom, Calhoun heard the knell of parting slavery; and on his death-bed he counseled secession. Washington and Jefferson and Madison had died despairing of the abolition of slavery; Calhoun died in despair at the growth of freedom. His system rushed irresistibly to its natural development. The death-struggle for California was followed by a short truce; but the new school of politicians who said that slavery was not evil, but good, soon sought to recover the ground they had lost, and confident of securing Kansas, they demanded that the established line in the Territories between freedom and slavery should be blotted out. The country, believing in the strength and enterprise and expansive energy of freedom, made answer, though reluctantly, "Be it so; let there be no strife between brethren: let freedom and slavery compete for the Territories on equal terms, in a fair field under an impartial administration; and on this theory, if on any, the contest might have been left to the decision of time."

DRED SCOTT DECISION.

The South started back in appallment from 39TH CONG. 1ST SESS. No. 51.

its victory; for it knew that a fair competition foreboded its defeat. But where could it now find an ally to save it from its own mistake? What I have next to say is spoken with no emotion but regret. Our meeting to-day is, as it were, at the grave, in the presence of Eternity, and the truth must be uttered in soberness and sincerity. In a great republic, as was observed more than two thousand years ago, any attempt to overturn the State owes its strength to aid from some branch of the Government. The Chief Justice of the United States, without any necessity or occasion, volunteered to come to the rescue of the theory of slavery. And from his court there lay no appeal but to the bar of humanity and history. Against the Constitution, against the memory of the nation, against a previous decision, against a series of enactments, he decided that the slave is property, that slave property is entitled to no less protection than any other property, that the Constitution upholds it in every Territory against any act of a local Legislature, and even against Congress itself; or, as the President of the time tersely promulgated the saying, "Kansas is as much a slave State as South Carolina or Georgia; slavery, by virtue of the Constitution, exists in every Territory." The municipal character of slavery being thus taken away, and slave property decreed to be "sacred," the authority of the courts was invoked to introduce it by the comity of law into States where slavery had been abolished; and in one of the courts of the United States a judge pronounced the African slave trade legitimate, and numerous and powerful advocates demanded its restoration.

TANEY AND SLAVE RACES.

Moreover, the Chief Justice, in his elaborate opinion, announced what had never been heard from any magistrate of Greece or Rome—what was unknown to civil law and canon law and feudal law and common law and constitutional law; unknown to Jay, to Rutledge, Ellsworth, and Marshall—that there are "slave races." The spirit of evil is intensely logical. Having the authority of this decision, five States swiftly followed the earlier example of a sixth, and opened the way for reducing the free negro to bondage; the migrating free negro became a slave if he but entered the jurisdiction of a seventh; and an eighth, from its extent and soil and mineral resources, destined to incalculable greatness, closed its eyes on its coming prosperity, and enacted—as by Taney's decision it had the right to do—that every free black man who would live within its limits must accept the condition of slavery for himself and his posterity.

SECESSION RESOLVED ON.

Only one step more remained to be taken. Jefferson and the leading statesmen of his day held fast to the idea that the enslavement of the African was socially, morally, and politically wrong. The new school was founded exactly upon the opposite idea; and they resolved first to distract the Democratic party, for which the Supreme Court had now furnished the means, and then to establish a new government, with negro slavery for its corner-stone, as socially, morally, and politically right.

THE ELECTION.

As the presidential election drew on, one of the old traditional parties did not make its appearance; the other reeled as it sought to preserve its old position; and the candidate who most nearly represented its best opinion, driven by patriotic zeal, roamed the country from end to end to speak for union, eager at least to confront its enemies, yet not having hope that it would find its deliverance through him. The storm rose to a whirlwind: who should allay its wrath? The most experienced statesmen of the country had failed; there was no hope from those who were great after the flesh; could relief come from one whose wisdom was like the wisdom of little children?

EARLY LIFE OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The choice of America fell on a man born west of the Alleghanies, in the cabin of poor people of Hardin county, Kentucky—Abraham Lincoln.

His mother could read but not write; his father could do neither; but his parents sent him, with an old spelling-book, to school, and he learned in his childhood to do both.

When eight years old he floated down the Ohio with his father on a raft which bore the family and all their possessions to the shore of Indiana; and, child as he was, he gave help as they toiled through dense forests to the interior of Spencer county. There, in the land of free labor, he grew up in a log cabin, with the solemn solitude for his teacher in his meditative hours. Of Asiatic literature he knew only the Bible; of Greek, Latin, and mediæval, no more than the translation of Æsop's Fables; of English, John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. The traditions of George Fox and William Penn passed to him dimly along the lines of two centuries through his ancestors, who were Quakers.

HIS EDUCATION.

Otherwise his education was altogether American. The Declaration of Independence was his compendium of political wisdom, the Life of Washington his constant study, and something of Jefferson and Madison reached him through Henry Clay, whom he honored from boyhood. For the rest, from day to day, he lived the life of the American people; walked in its light; reasoned with its reason; thought with its power of thought; felt the beatings of its mighty heart; and so was in every way a child of nature—a child of the West—a child of America.

HIS PROGRESS IN LIFE.

At nineteen, feeling impulses of ambition to get on in the world, he engaged himself to go down the Mississippi in a flat-boat, receiving ten dollars a month for his wages, and afterward he made the trip once more. At twenty-one he drove his father's cattle as the family migrated to Illinois, and split rails to fence in the new homestead in the wild. At twenty-three he was a captain of volunteers in the Black Hawk war. He kept a shop; he learned something of surveying; but of English literature he added to Bunyan nothing but Shakespeare's plays. At twenty-five he was elected to the Legislature of Illinois, where he served eight years. At twenty-seven he was admitted to the bar. In 1837 he chose his home at Springfield, the beautiful center of the richest land in the State. In 1847 he was a member of the national Congress, where he voted about forty times in favor of the principle of the Jefferson proviso. In 1854 he gave his influence to elect from Illinois to the American Senate a Democrat who would certainly do justice to Kansas. In 1858, as the rival of Douglas, he went before the people of the mighty Prairie State saying, "This Union cannot permanently endure, half slave and half free; the Union will not be dissolved, but the house will cease to be divided;" and now, in 1861, with no experience whatever as an executive officer, while States were madly flying from their orbit, and wise men knew not where to find counsel, this descendant of Quakers, this pupil of Bunyan, this child of the great West, was elected President of America.

He measured the difficulty of the duty that devolved on him, and was resolved to fulfill it.

HE GOES TO WASHINGTON.

As on the 11th of February, 1861, he left Springfield, which for a quarter of a century had been his happy home, to the crowd of his friends and neighbors whom he was never more to meet, he spoke a solemn farewell: "I know not how soon I shall see you again. A duty has devolved upon me greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since Washington. He never would have succeeded except for the aid of divine Providence, upon which he at all times relied. On the same Almighty Being I place my reliance. Pray that I may receive that divine assistance, without which I cannot succeed, but with which success is certain." To the men of Indiana he said, "I am but an accidental, temporary instrument; it is your business to rise up and preserve the Union and liberty." At the capital of Ohio he said, "Without a name, without a reason why I should have a name, there has fallen upon me a task such as did not rest even upon the father of his Country." At various places in New York, especially at Albany before the Legislature, which tendered him the united support of the great Empire State, he said, "While I hold myself the humblest of all the individuals who have ever been elevated to the Presidency, I have a more difficult task to perform than any of them. I bring a true heart to the work. I must rely upon the people of the whole country for support; and with their sustaining aid, even I, humble as I am, cannot fail to carry the ship of state safely through the storm." To the Assembly of New Jersey, at Trenton, he explained, "I shall take the ground I deem most just to the North, the East, the West, the South, and the whole country, in good temper, certainly with no malice to any section. I am devoted to peace, but it may be necessary to put the foot down firmly." In the old Independence Hall of Philadelphia he said, "I have never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence, which gave liberty, not alone to the people of this country, but to the world in all future time. If the country cannot be saved without giving up that principle, I would rather be assassinated on the spot than surrender it. I have said nothing but what I am willing to live and die by."

IN WHAT STATE HE FOUND THE COUNTRY.

Traveling in the dead of night to escape assassination, Lincoln arrived at Washington nine days before his inauguration. The outgoing President, at the opening of the session of Congress had still kept as the majority of his advisers men engaged in treason; had declared that in case of even an "imaginary" apprehension of danger from notions of freedom among the slaves, "disunion would become inevitable." Lincoln and others had questioned the opinion of Taney; such impugning he ascribed to the "factious temper of the times." The favorite doctrine of the majority of the Democratic party on the power of a Territorial Legislature over slavery he condemned as an attack on "the sacred rights of property." The State Legislatures, he insisted, must repeal what he called "their unconstitutional and obnoxious enactments," and which, if such, were "null and void," or "it would be impossible for any human power to save the Union." Nay, if these unimportant acts were not repealed, "the injured States would be justified in revolutionary resistance to the Government of the Union." He maintained that no State might secede at its sovereign will and pleasure; that the Union was meant for perpetuity; and that Congress might attempt to preserve it, but only by conciliation; that "the sword was not placed in their hands to preserve it by force;" that "the last desperate remedy of a despairing people" would be "an explanatory amendment recognizing the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States." The American Union he called "a confederacy" of States, and he thought it a duty to make the appeal for the amendment "before any of these States should separate themselves from the Union." The views of the Lieutenant General, containing some patriotic advice, "conceded the right of secession," pronounced a quadruple rupture of the Union "a smaller evil than the reuniting of the fragments by the sword," and "eschewed the idea of invading a seceded State." After changes in the Cabinet, the President informed Congress that "matters were still worse," that "the South suffered serious grievances," which should be redressed "in peace."

The day after this message the flag of the Union was fired upon from Fort Morris, and the insult was not revenged or noticed. Senators in Congress telegraphed to their constituents to seize the national forts, and they were not arrested. The finances of the country were grievously embarrassed. Its little army was not within reach—the part of it in Texas, with all its stores, was made over by its commander to the seceding insurgents. One State after another voted in convention to secede. A peace congress, so called, met at the request of Virginia to concert the terms of a capitulation for the continuance of the Union. Congress in both branches sought to devise conciliatory expedients; the Territories of the country were organized in a manner not to conflict with any pretensions of the South, or any decision of the Supreme Court; and, nevertheless, the seceding States formed at Montgomery a provisional government, and pursued their relentless purpose with such success that the Lieutenant General feared the city of Washington might find itself "included in a foreign country," and proposed, among the options for the consideration of Lincoln, to bid the seceded States "depart in peace." The great Republic seemed to have its emblem in the vast unfinished Capitol, at that moment surrounded by masses of stone and prostrate columns never yet lifted into their places; seemingly the monument of high but delusive aspirations, the confused wreck of inchoate magnificence, sadder than any ruin of Egyptian Thebes, or Athens.

HIS INAUGURATION.

The 4th of March came. With instinctive wisdom, the new President, speaking to the people on taking the oath of office, put aside every question that divided the country, and gained a right to universal support by planting himself on the single idea of the Union. That Union he declared to be unbroken and perpetual; and he announced his determination to fulfill "the simple duty of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed in all the States." Seven days later, the convention of confederate States unanimously adopted a constitution of their own; and the new government was authoritatively announced to be founded on the idea that slavery is the natural and normal condition of the negro race. The issue was made up whether the great Republic was to maintain its providential place in the history of mankind, or a rebellion founded on negro slavery gain a recognition of its principle throughout the civilized world. To the disaffected Lincoln had said, "You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors." To fire the passions of the southern portion of the people, the confederate government chose to become aggressors; and on the morning of the 12th of April began the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and compelled its evacuation.

UPRISING OF THE PEOPLE.

It is the glory of the late President that he had perfect faith in the perpetuity of the Union. Supported in advance by Douglas, who spoke as with the voice of a million, he instantly called a meeting of Congress, and summoned the people to come up and repossess the forts, places, and property which had been seized from the Union. The men of the North were trained in schools; industrious and frugal; many of them delicately bred, their minds teeming with ideas and fertile in plans of enterprise; given to the culture of the arts; eager in the pursuit of wealth, yet employing wealth less for ostentation than for developing the resources of their country; seeking happiness in the calm of domestic life; and such lovers of peace that for generations they had been reputed unwarlike. Now, at the cry of their country in its distress, they rose up with unappeasable patriotism; not hirelings—the purest and of the best blood in the land; sons of a pious ancestry, with a clear perception of duty, unclouded faith, and fixed resolve to succeed, they thronged round the President to support the wronged, the beautiful flag of the nation. The halls of theological seminaries sent forth their young men, whose lips were touched with eloquence, whose hearts kindled with devotion to serve in the ranks, and make their way to command only as they learned the art of war. Striplings in the colleges, as well the most gentle and the most studious; those of sweetest temper and loveliest character and brightest genius passed from their classes to the camp. The lumbermen from the forests; the mechanics from their benches, where they had been trained by the exercise of political rights to share the life and hope of the Republic, to feel their responsibility to their forefathers, their posterity, and mankind, went forth resolved that their dignity as a constituent part of this Republic should not be impaired. Farmers and sons of farmers left the land but half plowed, the grain but half planted, and, taking up the musket, learned to face without fear the presence of peril and the coming of death in the shocks of war, while their hearts were still attracted to their herds and fields and all the tender affections of home. Whatever there was of truth and faith and public love in the common heart broke out with one expression. The mighty winds blew from every quarter to fan the flame of the sacred and unquenchable fire.

THE WAR A WORLD-WIDE WAR.

For a time the war was thought to be confined to our own domestic affairs; but it was soon seen that it involved the destinies of mankind; its principles and causes shook the politics of Europe to the center, and from Lisbon to Peking divided the Governments of the world.

GREAT BRITAIN.

There was a kingdom whose people had in an eminent degree attained to freedom of industry and the security of person and property. Its middle class rose to greatness. Out of that class sprung the noblest poets and philosophers, whose words built up the intellect of its people; skillful navigators, to find out the many paths of the oceans; discoverers in natural science, whose inventions guided its industry to wealth, till it equaled any nation of the world in letters, and excelled all in trade and commerce. But its Government was become a Government of land, and not of men; every blade of grass was represented, but only a small minority of the people. In the transition from the feudal forms, the heads of the social organization freed themselves from the military services which were the conditions of their tenure, and, throwing the burden on the industrial classes, kept all the soil to themselves. Vast estates that had been managed by monasteries as endowments for religion and charity were appropriated to swell the wealth of courtiers and favorites; and the commons, where the poor man once had his right of pasture, were taken away, and, under forms of law, inclosed distributively within the domains of the adjacent landholders. Although no law forbade an inhabitant from purchasing land, the costliness of the transfer constituted a prohibition; so that it was the rule of that country that the plow should not be in the hands of its owner. The church was rested on a contradiction, claiming to be an embodiment of absolute truth, and yet was a creature of the statute-book.

HER SENTIMENTS.

The progress of time increased the terrible contrast between wealth and poverty; in their years of strength, the laboring people, cut off from all share in governing the State, derived a scanty support from the severest toil, and had no hope for old age but in public charity or death. A grasping ambition had dotted the world with military posts, kept watch over our borders on the northeast, at the Bermudas, in the West Indies, held the gates of the Pacific, of the Southern and of the Indian ocean, hovered on our northwest at Vancouver, appropriated the whole of the newest continent, and the entrances to the old Mediterranean and Red sea; and garrisoned forts all the way from Madras to China. That aristocracy had gazed with terror on the growth of a commonwealth where freeholds existed by the million, and religion was not in bondage to the State; and now they could not repress their joy at its perils. They had not one word of sympathy for the kind-hearted poor man's son whom America had chosen for her chief; they jeered at his large hands and long feet and ungainly stature; and the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made haste to send word through the palaces of Europe that the great Republic was in its agony, that the Republic was no more, that a head-stone was all that remained due by the law of nations to "the late Union." But it is written, "Let the dead bury their dead;" they may not bury the living. Let the dead bury their dead; let a bill of reform remove the worn-out government of a class, and infuse new life into the British constitution by confiding rightful power to the people. [Applause.]

HER POLICY.

But while the vitality of America is indestructible, the British Government hurried to do what never before had been done by Christian Powers, what was in direct conflict with its own exposition of public law in the time of our struggle for independence. Though the insurgent States had not a ship in an open harbor, it invested them with all the rights of a belligerent, even on the ocean; and this, too, when the rebellion was not only directed against the gentlest and most beneficent Government on earth, without a shadow of justifiable cause, but against human nature itself for the perpetual enslavement of a race. And the effect of this recognition was that acts in themselves piratical found shelter in British courts of law. The resources of British capitalists, their workshops, their armories, their private arsenals, their shipyards, were in league with the insurgents, and every British harbor in the wide world became a safe port for British ships, manned by British sailors, and armed with British guns, to prey on our peaceful commerce; even on our ships coming from British ports, freighted with British products, or that had carried gifts of grain to the English poor. The Prime Minister in the House of Commons, sustained by cheers, scoffed at the thought that their laws could be amended at our request so as to preserve real neutrality; and to remonstrances now owned to have been just, their Secretary answered that they could not change their laws ad infinitum.

RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

The people of America then wished, as they always have wished, as they still wish, friendly relations with England; and no man in England or America can desire it more strongly than I. This country has always yearned for good relations with England. Thrice only in all its history has that yearning been fairly met: in the days of Hampden and Cromwell, again in the first ministry of the elder Pitt, and once again in the ministry of Shelburne. Not that there have not at all times been just men among the peers of Britain—like Halifax, in the days of James II, or a Granville, an Argyll, or a Houghton in ours, [great applause:] and we cannot be indifferent to a country that produces statesmen like Cobden and Bright, [tremendous applause that lasted for several minutes:] but the best bower anchor of peace was the working class of England, [renewed applause that could not be repressed:] who suffered most from our civil war, but who, while they broke their diminished bread in sorrow, always encouraged us to persevere. [Great and long-continued applause.]

FRANCE AND THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

The act of recognizing the rebel belligerents was concerted with France; France, so beloved in America, on which she had conferred the greatest benefits that one people ever conferred on another; France, which stands foremost on the continent of Europe for the solidity of her culture, as well as for the bravery and generous impulses of her sons; France, which for centuries had been moving steadily in her own way toward intellectual and political freedom. The policy regarding further colonization of America by European Powers, known commonly as the doctrine of Monroe, had its origin in France: and, if it takes any man's name, should bear the name of Turgot. It was adopted by Louis XVI, in the cabinet of which Vergennes was the most important member. It is emphatically the policy of France; to which, with transient deviations, the Bourbons, the first Napoleon, the house of Orleans have ever adhered.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AND MEXICO.

The late President was perpetually harassed by rumors that the Emperor Napoleon III desired formally to recognize the States in rebellion as an independent Power, and that England held him back by her reluctance, or France by her traditions of freedom, or he himself by his own better judgment and clear perception of events. But the republic of Mexico, on our borders, was, like ourselves, distracted by a rebellion, and from a similar cause. The monarchy of England had fastened upon us slavery which did not disappear with independence; in like manner, the ecclesiastical policy established by the Spanish Council of the Indies, in the days of Charles V and Philip II, retained its vigor in the Mexican republic. The fifty years of civil war under which she had languished was due to the bigoted system which was the legacy of monarchy, just as here the inheritance of slavery kept alive political strife, and culminated in civil war. As with us there could be no quiet but through the end of slavery, so in Mexico there could be no prosperity until the crushing tyranny of intolerance should cease. The party of slavery in the United States sent their emissaries to Europe to solicit aid; and so did the party of the church in Mexico, as organized by the old Spanish Council of the Indies, but with a different result. Just as the Republican party had made an end of the rebellion, and was establishing the best government ever known in that region, and giving promise to the nation of order, peace, and prosperity, word was brought us, in the moment of our deepest affliction, that the French emperor, moved by a desire to erect in North America a buttress for imperialism, would transform the republic of Mexico into a secundo-geniture for the house of Hapsburg. America might complain; she could not then interpose, and delay seemed justifiable. It was seen that Mexico could not, with all its wealth of land, compete in cereal products with our Northwest, nor, in tropical products, with Cuba; nor could it, under a disputed dynasty, attract capital, or create public works, or develop mines, or borrow money; so that the imperial system of Mexico, which was forced at once to recognize the wisdom of the policy of the republic by adopting it, could prove only an unremunerating drain on the French treasury for the support of an Austrian adventurer.

THE PERPETUITY OF REPUBLICAN INSTITUTIONS.

Meantime, a new series of momentous questions grows up, and forces themselves on the consideration of the thoughtful. Republicanism has learned how to introduce into its constitution every element of order, as well as every element of freedom; but thus far the continuity of its government has seemed to depend on the continuity of elections. It is now to be considered how perpetuity is to be secured against foreign occupation. The successor of Charles I of England dated his reign from the death of his father; the Bourbons coming back, after a long series of revolutions, claimed that the Louis who became king was the eighteenth of that name. The present Emperor of the French, disdaining a title from election alone, is called the third Napoleon. Shall a republic have less power of continuance when invading armies prevent a peaceful resort to the ballot-box? What force shall it attach to intervening legislation? What validity to debts contracted for its overthrow? These momentous questions are, by the invasion of Mexico, thrown up for solution. A free State once truly constituted should be as undying as its people; the republic of Mexico must rise again. [Loud applause.]

THE POPE OF ROME AND THE REBELLION.

It was the condition of affairs in Mexico that involved the Pope of Rome in our difficulties so far that he alone among temporal sovereigns recognized the chief of the confederate States as a president, and his supporters as a people; and in letters to two great prelates of the Catholic church in the United States gave counsels for peace at a time when peace meant the victory of secession. Yet events move as they are ordered. The blessing of the Pope of Rome on the head of Duke Maximilian could not revive in the nineteenth century the ecclesiastical policy of the sixteenth; and the result is only a new proof that there can be no prosperity in the State without religious freedom.

THE PEOPLE OF AMERICA.

When it came home to the consciousness of the Americans that the war which they were waging was a war for the liberty of all the nations of the world, for freedom itself, they thanked God for giving them resignation to the severity of the trial to which He put their sincerity, and nerved themselves for their duty with an inexorable will. The President was led along by the greatness of their self-sacrificing example; and as a child, in a dark night on a rugged way, catches hold of the hand of its father for guidance and support, he clung fast to the hand of the people, and moved calmly through the gloom. While the statesmanship of Europe was scoffing at the hopeless vanity of their efforts, they put forth such miracles of energy as the history of the world had never known. The Navy of the United States, drawing into the public service the willing militia of the seas, doubled its tonnage in eight months, and established an actual blockade from Cape Hatteras to the Rio Grande; in the course of the war it was increased fivefold in men and in tonnage, while the inventive genius of the country devised more effective kinds of ordnance, and new forms of naval architecture in wood and iron. There went into the field for various terms of service about two million men; and in March last the men in service exceeded a million; that is to say, making allowance for two hundred thousand black troops, chiefly from the South, nine of every twenty able-bodied men took some part in the war; and at one time every fifth able-bodied man was in the field. In one single month, one hundred and sixty-five thousand were recruited into service. Once, within four weeks, Ohio organized and placed in the field forty-two regiments of infantry—nearly thirty-six thousand men; and Ohio was like other States in the East and in the West. The well-mounted cavalry numbered eighty-four thousand; of horses there were bought, first and last, two thirds of a million. In the movements of troops science came in aid of patriotism; so that to choose a single instance out of many, an army twenty-three thousand strong, with its artillery, trains, baggage, and animals, were moved by rail from the Potomac to the Tennessee, twelve hundred miles, in seven days. In the long marches, wonders of military construction bridged the rivers; and wherever an army halted ample supplies awaited them at their ever-changing base. The vile thought that life is the greatest of blessings did not rise up. In six hundred and twenty-five battles and severe skirmishes blood flowed like water. It streamed over the grassy plains; it stained the rocks; the undergrowth of the forests was red with it; and the armies marched on with majestic courage from one conflict to another, knowing that they were fighting for God and liberty. The organization of the medical department met its infinitely multiplied duties with exactness and dispatch. At the news of a battle, the best surgeons of our cities hastened to the field to offer the zealous aid of the greatest experience and skill. The gentlest and most refined of women left homes of luxury and ease to build hospital tents near the armies and serve as nurses to the sick and dying. Beside the large supply of religious teachers by the public, the congregations spared to their brothers in the field the ablest ministers. The Christian Commission, which expended $3,500,000, sent four thousand clergymen chosen out of the best to keep unsoiled the religious character of the men, and made gifts of clothes and food and medicine. The organization of private charity assumed unheard-of dimensions. The Sanitary Commission, which had seven thousand societies, distributed, under the direction of an unpaid board, spontaneous contributions to the amount of $13,000,000 in supplies or money—$1,500,000 from California alone—and dotted the scene of war from Paducah to Port Royal, from Belle Plain, Virginia, to Brownsville, Texas, with homes and lodges.

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

The country had for its allies the river Mississippi, which would not be divided, and the range of mountains which carried the stronghold of the free through Western Virginia and Kentucky and Tennessee to the highlands of Alabama. But it invoked the still higher power of immortal justice. In ancient Greece, where servitude was the universal custom, it was held that if a child were to strike its parent, the slave should defend the parent, and by that act recover his freedom. After vain resistance, Lincoln, who had tried to solve the question by gradual emancipation, by colonization, and by compensation, at last saw that slavery must be abolished or the Republic must die; and on the 1st day of January, 1862, he wrote liberty on the banners of the armies. When this proclamation, which struck the fetters from three million slaves, reached Europe, Lord Russell, a countryman of Milton and Wilberforce, eagerly put himself forward to speak of it in the name of mankind, saying, "It is of a very strange nature;" "a measure of war of a very questionable kind;" an act "of vengeance on the slave-owner," that does no more than "profess to emancipate slaves where the United States authorities cannot make emancipation a reality." Now, there was no part of the country embraced in the proclamation where the United States could not and did not make emancipation a reality. Those who saw Lincoln most frequently had never before heard him speak with bitterness of any human being; but he did not conceal how keenly he felt that he had been wronged by Lord Russell. And he wrote, in reply to another cavalier, "The emancipation policy, and the use of colored troops were the greatest blows yet dealt to the rebellion. The job was a great national one; and let none be slighted who bore an honorable part in it. I hope peace will come soon, and come to stay; then will there be some black men who can remember that they have helped mankind to this great consummation." [Applause.]

RUSSIA AND CHINA.

The proclamation accomplished its end, for during the war our armies came into military possession of every State in rebellion. Then, too, was called forth the new power that comes from the simultaneous diffusion of thought and feeling among the nations of mankind. The mysterious sympathy of the millions throughout the world was given spontaneously. The best writers of Europe waked the conscience of the thoughtful till the intelligent moral sentiment of the Old World was drawn to the side of the unlettered statesman of the West. Russia, whose emperor had just accomplished one of the grandest acts [here the orator was interrupted by the longest and loudest applause] in the course of time by raising twenty million [applause renewed at the mention of the number] bondmen into freeholders, [great and long-continued applause,] and thus assuring the growth and culture of a Russian people, remained our unwavering friend. [Another burst of applause.] From the oldest abode of civilization, which gave the first example of an imperial government with equality among the people, Prince Kung, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, remembered the saying of Confucius, that we should not do to others what we would not that others should do to us, and in the name of the Emperor of China closed its ports against the war ships and privateers of "the seditious." [Very long and loud applause.]

CONTINUANCE OF THE WAR.

The war continued, with all the peoples of the world for anxious spectators. Its cares weighed heavily on Lincoln, and his face was plowed with the furrows of thought and sadness. With malice toward none, free from the spirit of revenge, victory made him importunate for peace; and his enemies never doubted his word or despaired of his abounding clemency. He longed to utter pardon as the word for all, but not unless the freedom of the negro should be assured. The grand battles of Mill Spring, which gave us Nashville, of Fort Den-elson, Malvern Hill, Antietam, Gettysburg, the Wilderness of Virginia, Winchester, Nashville, the capture of New Orleans, Vicksburg, Mobile, Fort Fisher, the march from Atlanta, and the capture of Savannah and Charleston, all foretold the issue. Still more, the self-regeneration of Missouri, the heart of the continent; of Maryland, whose sons never heard the midnight bells chime so sweetly as when they rang out to earth and heaven that by the voice of her own people she took her place among the free; of Tennessee, which passed through fire and blood, through sorrows and the shadow of death, to work out her own deliverance, and by the faithfulness of her own sons to renew her youth like the eagle—proved that victory was deserved and would be worth all that it cost. If words of mercy, uttered as they were by Lincoln on the waters of Virginia, were defiantly repelled, the armies of the country, moving with one will, went as the arrow to its mark, and without a feeling of revenge struck a death-blow at rebellion.

LINCOLN'S ASSASSINATION.

Where, in the history of nations, had a Chief Magistrate possessed more sources of consolation and joy than Lincoln? His countrymen had shown their love by choosing him to a second term of service. The raging war that had divided the country had lulled; and private grief was hushed by the grandeur of its results. The nation had its new birth of freedom, soon to be secured forever by an amendment of the Constitution. His persistent gentleness had conquered for him a kindlier feeling on the part of the South. His scoffers among the grandees of Europe began to do him honor. The laboring classes everywhere saw in his advancement their own. All peoples sent him their benedictions. And at the moment of the height of his fame, to which his humility and modesty added charms, he fell by the hand of the assassin; and the only triumph awarded him was the march to the grave.

THE GREATNESS OF MAN.

This is no time to say that human glory is but dust and ashes, that we mortals are no more than shadows in pursuit of shadows. How mean a thing were man, if there were not that within him which is higher than himself; if he could not master the illusions of sense, and discern the connections of events by a superior light which comes from God. He so shares the divine impulses that he has power to subject interested passions to love of country, and personal ambition to the ennoblement of his kind. Not in vain has Lincoln lived, for he has helped to make this Republic an example of justice, with no caste but the caste of humanity. The heroes who led our armies and ships into battle—Lyon, McPherson, Reynolds, Sedgwick, Wadsworth, Foote, Ward, with their compeers—and fell in the service, did not die in vain: they and the myriads of nameless martyrs, and he, the chief martyr, died willingly "that government of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth." [Loud applause.]

THE JUST DIED FOR THE UNJUST.

The assassination of Lincoln, who was so free from malice, has by some mysterious influence struck the country with solemn awe, and hushed, instead of exciting, the passion for revenge. It seems as if the just had died for the unjust. When I think of the friends I have lost in this war—and every one who hears me has, like myself, lost some of those whom he most loved—there is no consolation to be derived from victims on the scaffold, or from anything but the established union of the regenerated nation. [Applause.]

CHARACTER OF LINCOLN.

In his character, Lincoln was through and through an American. He is the first native of the region west of the Alleghanies to attain to the highest station; and how happy it is that the man who was brought forward as the natural outgrowth and first fruits of that region should have been of unblemished purity in private life, a good son, a kind husband, a most affectionate father, and, as a man, so gentle to all. As to integrity, Douglas, his rival, said of him, "Lincoln is the honestest man I ever knew."

The habits of his mind were those of meditation and inward thought, rather than of action. He excelled in logical statement, more than in executive ability. He reasoned clearly, his reflective judgment was good, and his purposes were fixed; but, like the Hamlet of his only poet, his will was tardy in action; and for this reason, and not from humility or tenderness of feeling, he sometimes deplored that the duty which devolved on him had not fallen to the lot of another. He was skillful in analysis; discerned with precision the central idea on which a question turned, and knew how to disengage it and present it by itself in a few homely, strong old English words that would be intelligible to all. He delighted to express his opinions by an apothegm, illustrate them by a parable, or drive them home by a story.

Lincoln gained a name by discussing questions which, of all others, most easily lead to fanaticism; but he was never carried away by enthusiastic zeal, never indulged in extravagant language, never hurried to support extreme measures, never allowed himself to be controlled by sudden impulses. During the progress of the election at which he was chosen President, he expressed no opinion that went beyond the Jefferson proviso of 1784. Like Jefferson and La Fayette, he had faith in the intuitions of the people, and read those intuitions with rare sagacity. He knew how to bide his time, and was less apt to run ahead of opinion than to lag behind. He never sought to electrify the public by taking an advanced position with a banner of a section; but rather studied to move forward compactly, exposing no detachment in front or rear; so that the course of his Administration might have been explained as the calculating policy of a shrewd and watchful politician, had there not been seen behind it a fixedness of principle which from the first determined his purpose and grew more intense with every year, consuming his life by its energy. Yet his sensibilities were not acute, he had no vividness of imagination to picture to his mind the horrors of the battle-field or the sufferings in hospitals; his conscience was more tender than his feelings.

Lincoln was one of the most unassuming of men. In time of success, he gave credit for it to those whom he employed, to the people, and to the providence of God. He did not know what ostentation is; when he became President he was rather saddened than elated, and his conduct and manners showed more than ever his belief that all men are born equal. He was no respecter of persons; and neither rank, nor reputation, nor services overawed him. In judging of character he failed in discrimination, and his appointments were sometimes bad; but he readily deferred to public opinion, and in appointing the head of the armies he followed the manifest preference of Congress. [Applause.]

A good President will secure unity to his administration by his own supervision of the various departments. Lincoln, who accepted advice readily, was never governed by any member of his Cabinet, and could not be moved from a purpose deliberately formed; but his supervision of affairs was unsteady and incomplete; and sometimes, by a sudden interference transcending the usual forms, he rather confused than advanced the public business. If he ever failed in the scrupulous regard due to the relative rights of Congress, it was so evidently without design that no conflict could ensue, or evil precedent be established. Truth he would receive from any one; but, when impressed by others, he did not use their opinions till by reflection he had made them thoroughly his own.

It was the nature of Lincoln to forgive. When hostilities ceased, he who had always sent forth the flag with every one of its stars in the field, was eager to receive back his returning countrymen, and meditated "some new announcement to the South." The amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery had his most earnest and unwearied support. During the rage of war we get a glimpse into his soul from his privately suggesting to Louisiana that "in defining the franchise some of the colored people might be let in," saying, "They would probably help, in some trying time to come, to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom." [Long-continued and enthusiastic demonstrations of applause.] In 1857 he avowed himself "not in favor of" what he improperly called "negro citizenship;" for the Constitution discriminates between citizens and electors. Three days before his death he declared his preference that "the elective franchise were now conferred on the very intelligent of the colored men and on those of them who served our cause as soldiers;" but he wished it done by the States themselves, and he never harbored the thought of exacting it from a new government as a condition of its recognition. [Applause.]

The last day of his life beamed with sunshine, as he sent by the Speaker of this House his friendly greetings to the men of the Rocky mountains and the Pacific slope; as he contemplated the return of hundreds of thousands of soldiers to fruitful industry; as he welcomed in advance hundreds of thousands of emigrants from Europe; as his eye kindled with enthusiasm at the coming wealth of the nation. And so, with these thoughts for his country, he was removed from the toils and temptations of this life and was at peace.

PALMERSTON AND LINCOLN.

Hardly had the late President been consigned to the grave when the Prime Minister of England died, full of years and honors. Palmerston traced his lineage to the time of the Conqueror; Lincoln went back only to his grandfather. Palmerston received his education from the best scholars of Harrow, Edinburgh, and Cambridge; Lincoln's early teachers were the silent forest, the prairie, the river, and the stars. Palmerston was in public life for sixty years; Lincoln for but a tenth of that time. Palmerston was a skillful guide of an established aristocracy; Lincoln a leader or rather a companion of the people. Palmerston was exclusively an Englishman, and made his boast in the House of Commons that the interest of England was his shibboleth; Lincoln thought always of mankind as well as of his own country, and served human nature itself. Palmerston from his narrowness as an Englishman did not endear his country to any one court or to any one people, but rather caused uneasiness and dislike; Lincoln left America more beloved than ever by all the peoples of Europe. Palmerston was self-possessed and adroit in reconciling the claims of the factions of the aristocracy; Lincoln, frank and ingenuous, knew how to poise himself on the conflicting opinions of the people. Palmerston was capable of insolence toward the weak, quick to the sense of honor, not heedful of right; Lincoln rejected counsel given only as a matter of policy, and was not capable of being wilfully unjust. Palmerston, essentially superficial, delighted in banter and knew how to divert grave opposition by playful levity; Lincoln was a man of infinite jest on his lips, with saddest earnestness at his heart. Palmerston was a fair representative of the aristocratic liberality of the day, choosing for his tribunal, not the conscience of humanity, but the House of Commons; Lincoln took to heart the eternal truths of liberty, obeyed them as the commands of Providence, and accepted the human race as the judge of his fidelity. Palmerston did nothing that will endure: his great achievement, the separation of Belgium, placed that little kingdom where it must gravitate to France; Lincoln finished a work which all time cannot overthrow. Palmerston is a shining example of the abject of a cultivated aristocracy; Lincoln is the genuine fruit of institutions where the laboring man shares and assists to form the great ideas and designs of his country. Palmerston was buried in Westminster Abbey by the order of the Queen, and was followed by the British aristocracy to his grave, which after a few years will hardly be noticed by the side of the graves of Fox and Chatham; Lincoln was followed by the sorrow of his country across the continent to his resting-place in the heart of the Mississippi valley, to be remembered through all time by his countrymen, and by all the peoples of the world. [Long-continued applause.]

CONCLUSION.

As the sum of all, the hand of Lincoln raised the flag; the American people was the hero of the war; and therefore the result is a new era of republicanism. The disturbances in the country grew not out of anything republican, but out of slavery, which is a part of the system of hereditary wrong; and the expulsion of this domestic anomaly opens to the renovated nation a career of unthought-of dignity and glory. Henceforth our country has a moral unity as the land of free labor. The party for slavery and the party against slavery are no more, and are merged in the party of union and freedom. The States which would have left us are not brought back as conquered States, for then we should hold them only so long as that conquest could be maintained; they come to their rightful place under the Constitution as original, necessary, and inseparable members of the Union. [Applause.]

We build monuments to the dead, but no monuments of victory. We respect the example of the Romans, who never, even in conquered lands, raised emblems of triumph. And our generals are not to be classed in the herd of vulgar conquerors, but are of the school of Lancelotti and William of Orange and Washington. They have used the sword only to give peace to their country and restore her to her place in the great assembly of the nations.

Senators and Representatives, as I bid you farewell, my last word shall be a word of hope; for now there is a nation which for the first time in the world is ready to live according to the laws of reason, and true republicanism is entrenched in a regenerated continent.

[The orator, on concluding, was greeted with an outburst of the heartiest applause, in which the whole audience joined.]

The exercises of the occasion were closed (at three o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) by the following benediction by Rev. Dr. GRAY, Chaplain of the Senate:

God of a bereaved nation, from Thy high and holy habitation look down upon us and suitably impress us to-day with a sense that only God is great. Kings and Presidents die; but Thou, the universal Ruler, livest to rule undisturbed on Thine everlasting throne. A wail has gone up from the heart of the nation to heaven—O, hear, and pity, and save. We pray that Thou wilt command Thy blessing now upon the family of the President dead; upon the President living; upon the ministers of state; upon the united Houses of Congress; upon the officers of the Army and the Navy; upon the broken families and desolated homes all over the land; and upon the nation. And grant that grace and peace and mercy from the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the fellowship of God the Spirit, may rest upon and abide with us all, forever and ever. Amen.

The members of the Senate, preceded by the President pro tempore, then retired from the Hall.

The SPEAKER called the House of Representatives to order.

THANKS TO HON. GEORGE BANCROFT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced the following concurrent resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the thanks of Congress be presented to Hon. George Bancroft for the appropriate memorial address delivered by him on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, in the Representatives' Hall, before both Houses of Congress and their invited guests, on the 12th day of February, 1866, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication.

Resolved, That the chairman of the joint committee appointed to make the necessary arrangements to carry into effect the resolution of this Congress in relation to the memorial exercises in honor of Abraham Lincoln be requested to communicate to Mr. Bancroft the foregoing resolution, receive his answer thereto, and present the same to both Houses of Congress.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of February, the memorial of Brevet Brigadier General B. S. Roberts, setting forth his views of a plan for reclaiming the swamps and waste lands of the basin of the lower Mississippi river; which was, on motion of Mr. Foor, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the credentials of Lewis E. Parsons, chosen a Senator from the State of Alabama for the term commencing March 4, 1865. As the State of Alabama is one of the States that during a period of four years has been in rebellion against the United States, and as Congress has not yet determined whether the political condition of affairs in that State is such as to entitle the State to representation in the Senate, I do not expect that Governor Parsons will be requested to come forward and take the oath at this time; but I ask that the credentials be received and laid upon the table to await the further action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of residents of Lewis county, New York, late officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates in the recent war, praying for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented two petitions of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the tax on the sales of their manufactures, and for a removal of the tax now assessed on detached portions of machinery manufactured by them; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented four petitions of persons engaged in mining and running coal from the Monongahela coal fields to market on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, praying for such an amendment of the enrollment act as to exempt from its provisions all coal-boats, coal-barges, and coal-flats, which are used exclusively for running coal to market, and are not used for any other purpose; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented two petitions of manufacturers of agricultural implements, praying for a reduction of the tax on sales of their manufactures, and for the removal of the tax now assessed on detached portions of machinery manufactured by them; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of mechanics and laborers in American manufacturing establishments, and a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for such an adjustment of the tariff of duties on foreign imports as will afford the amplest protection to the labor and industry of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for an increase of the duty on imports of foreign wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present also the petition of a number of citizens of Ohio, praying that, as slavery has been abolished by the Government, the representation founded upon slavery be also abolished. The gist of the whole matter is in a few words, which I will read: "Those who refuse to others the right of being represented ought not to be rewarded for this injustice by having themselves an increased representation on their account." As this subject is under consideration in the joint committee on reconstruction, I think it had better be referred to that committee.

The petition was so referred.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of altering the provisions of the land grant to the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Fort Gibson railroad, together with a branch from Lawrence to Emporia, so as to make Burlingame a point on that road; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to present a petition of sundry citizens of Will county, Illinois, on the subject of the restoration of the late rebel States. The petition is signed by R. W. French and others, objecting to the restoration of any of the States lately in rebellion until adequate security has been obtained against any renewed effort to secede; and they point out certain amendments to the Constitution which they believe necessary. I move that it be referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL also presented a petition of manufacturers of agricultural implements of Belleville, Illinois, praying for a reduction of the tax on sales of their manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented additional papers in the case of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin, praying for indemnity for the alleged illegal seizure and confiscation of their property at Apia, in the Navigators' Islands, by the United States consul stationed there; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of Augustus Hubbell, praying for a settlement of his accounts, and that he may be allowed credit for money alleged to have been stolen from him on or about July 17, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of Captain Faircloth, praying for remuneration for property lost on board the steamer Boston, which was destroyed while on an expedition up the Ashepo river, in South Carolina, on the 26th of May, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the mining board of Gilpin county, Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of any law affecting the present status of mining claims in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of St. Croix valley, Minnesota, praying that a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land may be made to Lemuel Bolles for his services to the early settlers in that section; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Rev. Henry T. Cheever and the deacons and prudential committee of the Summer street chapel church, of Worcester, Massachusetts, praying Congress to grant justice to the colored population of the country; which was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. HOWE presented three petitions of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for a reduction of the tax on the sale of agricultural implements; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE. I present a petition signed by Stoddard Judd, and many other citizens of Wisconsin, praying that all banks who go into liquidation and deposit lawful money of the United States for the full amount of their outstanding circulation with the banking department of the State where located, according to the provisions of its State banking law, may be treated in the same manner as though deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, according to the one hundred and tenth section of the internal revenue act, in regard to exempting from tax notes of banks ceasing to issue notes for circulation. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, presented a petition of late officers of the United States Army, praying that officers promoted from the ranks may receive the bounties provided by Congress for volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of citizens of Buffalo, New York, remonstrating against the restoration of any State lately in rebellion until adequate security has been obtained against a renewed attempt to secede, against any representation in Congress beyond a just proportion of voting population, against any payment of the rebel debt or for emancipated slaves, and against any distinction on account of color or descent, and praying for such amendments to the Constitution as will enforce the foregoing provisions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Wyandt, Putnam & Co., of Milton, Stark county, Ohio, praying for a reduction of the taxes on the sales of agricultural implements; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE. I present a memorial, very numerously signed by colored soldiers in the department of the Mississippi, setting forth that they have faithfully served their country in the Army, and assisted in defending the country against its enemies, and praying for the right of suffrage to be extended to them and to all other colored persons. I ask the reference of this memorial to the joint committee on reconstruction.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President—

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio give way to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Ohio one question, and it is in reference to a historic fact. He says the petition he presents is from "colored" persons. I want to know from him where he gets the origin of the term "colored," as applied to the negro population. I am not much of a student of history, sir, but yet sometimes I do mouse about in that department—

Mr. WADE. What is the question?

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Delaware to propose to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, and the Chair inquired if the Senator from Ohio gave way.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The amiable Senator from Ohio will answer my question. Where does he get the term "colored?"

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will repeat the question to the Senator from Ohio whether he gives way to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WADE. I give way. I have nothing more.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio where he gets the term "colored," as applied to the negro population of the country? It is a term that has been used frequently in this Chamber; it is upon everybody's lips. Where does he get it? I know that term is used in the history of the West India islands; but the word "colored," as used in the history of San Domingo and Hayti, was applied to mulattoes, and never applied to negroes. I am simply inquiring for information of the Senator, when he applies the term "colored" to negroes, the origin of the term as applied to races. It is so frequently used in this Chamber that I want the attention of the country brought to that question, how the term "colored" is used in reference to the negro population.

The petition was referred to the joint committee on reconstruction.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 67) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COWAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of persons engaged in running coal to market down the Ohio river from Pittsburg, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio river between Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Buffington Island, West Virginia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for an amendment of the act requiring the enrollment of boats, barges, scows, &c., as will exempt from its provisions all coal-boats, coal-barges, and coal-flats, which are used exclusively for running coal to market, and are not used for any other purpose whatever, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 61) to establish certain post roads, reported them with further amendments.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 20) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast, by the southern route, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 188) to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

SECURITY OF RIGHTS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States have instructed me to report a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I move that for the present it lie upon the table, and be printed.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BROWN. Let it be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read in full.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE — The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.

The joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 60) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees," and for other purposes; which was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) for the transfer of funds appropriated for the payment of salaries in the Post Office Department to the general salary account of that Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXPLORATION OF THE YELLOWSTONE.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of Major Reynolds, United States engineer, made in 1859 and 1860, of his exploration of the Yellowstone and the country drained by that river.

DANGERS OF TUBULAR BOILERS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire what legislation is needed by Congress to protect the lives of passengers on the western waters from the danger of explosion incident to the use of tubular boilers.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 7th instant, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) directing the distribution of the writings of James Madison.

And that on the 10th instant he had approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 86) granting the franking privilege to Mary Lincoln;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the time for the completion of the Burlington and Missouri River railroad;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) tendering the thanks of Congress to Vice Admiral David G. Farragut, and to the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the action in Mobile bay on the 5th August, 1864; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) for the payment of expenses incurred by the joint committee to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 122) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1867, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to reconsider the vote on the passage of House bill No. 185, which has been several times before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. SPRAGUE on the 26th of January last to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 185) to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods for consumption from public store and bonded warehouse, and for other purposes, was passed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, this proposition has been before the Senate three times, and on each occasion the morning hour having expired during its discussion it went over. On the last occasion I had the honor to occupy the floor for a few moments. When I say that I believe the passage of this measure will be as injurious to the industrial interests of this country as would have been the dissemination of fever and the other diseases that Dr. Blackburn, the rebel emissary, endeavored to introduce into this country upon the lives of the people, the Senate of the United States will understand the position that I occupy and the earnestness with which I desire to call attention to this question. For the life of me, I cannot understand the reason for the haste manifested in pressing a measure of this kind upon the attention of the Senate, when there are before every committee having cognizance of those matters petitions from every part of the country disclosing the distress under which the industrial, mechanical, and manufacturing interests of the country are to-day laboring. Why this haste in introducing this measure without any explanation as to its necessity or as to its uses? We are told that it is right, without any argument or proof to indicate that it is right. We are also told that the Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of its passage, and therefore it must be right. We are also told that it is only to place foreign importations on an equality with the manufacturing, mechanical, and industrial interests of this country as respects taxation; that those great interests of the people do not pay taxes prior to the time the imported article does, or, in other words, that the Government extends the time for the payment of taxes upon manufactures as much as it extends the time for the payment of duties upon imports.

I endeavored to state on a previous occasion that prior to the introduction of domestic commodities to the consumer, five taxes are already paid to the Government; and I know of repeated instances where the taxes due the Government have been paid a year before the goods have been delivered to the consumer; and yet here a proposition is presented to the Senate proposing to give to the importer of the foreign article that comes in competition with the domestic, it may be three years of credit. The answer to that is, that it is not desired, that three years are not deemed necessary. Why ask for three years, then? We are told that nobody purchases goods that they may remain so long unsold. Why ask, then, for that privilege? Is it not plain to the Senate that in giving a credit on the imported article of three years, or two years, or one year, the Government is deprived of interest on the amount of the duties for the time being? Does the Senate understand that in affording this privilege to this class interest, it not only unites the capital of the country with the power of the Treasury Department in the formation and in the successful carrying into execution of a grand speculation, but it deprives the country of it may be a year's interest, six months' certainly, and it may be three years' interest upon the duties on many of the articles already introduced into the country.

I ask Senators if the finances of the country are in such a condition that they desire to give credit or relief in the matter of interest to any class of articles imported into this country. Sir, during the last year you imported something like $234,000,000, of which $51,000,000 were not dutiable articles. Now, if you refuse, as you do by this bill, to collect the duties when they are payable on this $234,000,000 of imports, do you not lose six, eight, or eleven per cent. on the amount of duty payable, according to the rate of interest which your bonds and other securities bear? Is it not plain to you that you deprive the Government of the interest which is due them upon this amount of dutiable articles? Certainly by the passage of this bill the Treasury and the revenues of the country will lose from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000. Sir, I speak of that which I know, of that which has come under my observation practically. I speak of these interests, commercial, mechanical, and manufacturing, because they have been brought under my personal supervision.

As to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury on this question, it is good for all that it is worth. I accord to him all the respect which his high office and his eminent qualities demand for him; but I am glad that the time has come when a Senator can stand up here in his place in the Senate and state his objection to the policy or plans of any officer of this Government without being held to a strict accountability for his words, and certainly without being termed disloyal. I do not believe that my constituents or the constituents of any Senator here desire that we shall take the opinions of any man, however eminent he may be, as a guide for our conduct. Certainly when it is discovered that I am walking in the shadow of another man's greatness, I desire that some kind friend may inform me of that fact that I may hide my face from the gaze of men. Sir, it is nothing to the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury approves of this measure, except so far as he may state good and satisfactory reasons for placing it before Congress; but he, or his agent, readily assents to the position which has been taken, that it is a union of the parties in intrigue and the Government to withhold from consumption in order to advance prices to consumers. He has, through his agent, who had the manipulation of this bill, assented to that proposition and assented to the correctness of the views that I state. If that is the case, if officers under the Government are willing to assent to that proposition, it is no plan that should be presented for the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Now, I assert, and challenge contradiction, that the object of this bill and the object of the similar bills which have been in operation in the past, is to regulate trade, to regulate prices. Does the Senate of the United States desire to regulate prices by law? Are Senators prepared to give their assent to propositions of that kind? If the importer or trader in articles not the production of this country can regulate the prices in one way, is it not competent for him to regulate them in another? If he can regulate them low, is it not competent for him to regulate them high as well? It is in my knowledge that they have succeeded in regulating prices very low for a time, destroying domestic competition, taking possession of the market, and then increasing prices at an enormous rate. As an illustration of that idea, let me state the fact, that in the introduction of tin plate into the consumption of this country, there were imported during the last year eight hundred thousand boxes of that article. The foreign manufacturers and the foreign capitalists succeeded in introducing it in the past in a way that has driven its manufacture entirely from the American market, so that there is not a manufacturer of that article in this country. There were imported last year eight hundred thousand boxes, forty thousand tons, of iron, at a cost of $12,000,000 to the consumers of this country; and what does it cost to produce it? With an importation of $12,000,000, that article costs, as laid down here, nine cents per pound. The foreign manufacturer makes seven cents a pound. That money goes for the payment of the industry, the manufacturing skill, the commerce, and all the appurtenances of trade in other countries. One half the profit goes to the importer of that article; he makes his three and a half cents per pound, and becomes an importer occupying one half of the situation, or, in other words, doing one half of the business, and he nets his $1,250,000 a year out of that operation. I challenge contradiction to the position I take, that the result of this system has so operated to check the growth of the manufacturing interest of this country in that respect, (and that one article is a representative,) as to drive out its competition, to occupy its field, and then extort from the consumptive abilities of the country this enormous profit.

I state this simply from the fact that for the last six months Congress and the country have been flooded with statements of the immense profits of manufacturing. I ask any Senator here whether it is not better for this country to keep within itself the $12,000,000 than to be satisfied simply with the $2,000,000 or $2,500,000 that the importer and the shipper receive for doing that business. It is a matter of simple calculation that should convince the mind of any individual, whether a Senator or a business man, that it is our true economy not to put ourselves in the hands of any other people. Now, as to the profits of manufacturing, I know something about them, and I know, and I challenge contradiction, that the same amount of capital invested in foreign commerce has produced three times the amount of the best dividends from manufacturing. I know further, that the same capital engaged in banking has produced twofold that of the best manufacturing dividends in this country. In respect to the dividends from manufacturing, I desire to state that the dividends that have been declared were declared upon a reduced capital. In nine cases out of ten the manufacturing establishments that have given such enormous profits had been sold, many of them had become bankrupt, prior to the war, and they had been capitalized at one half, and in many cases one fourth, of their original capital. The consequences are plain, that if they made anything at all, they would make larger dividends than was ever known in the history of the companies.

We are told by those who advocate this bill that it is desired to introduce through this warehouse system goods that they may be convenient for reexportation, that they be at hand in bulk in order that they may be sent to foreign ports. Let us look at it. Out of the $234,000,000 of goods imported into the country during the past year, but $10,000,000 were reexported. I know within my own circle of half a dozen interests, each one as large as that, carried on for the benefit of the people in whose location they exist. For the sake of that $10,000,000 reexported, it is proposed to introduce and continue a system which has its influence over every portion of the industrial system and interest of this country, which affects all our people, east, west, north, and south. For western gentlemen to say that they desire to have a market, not alone in their own country, but a market in their own country and in foreign countries, too, is not sensible and is not warranted by the facts and situation of the case. It is impossible for you to ship your corn or your wheat to any extent to France or to England. To-day the price of wheat in France is one dollar a bushel; in England $1 09. If you are willing to sell your wheat for eighty cents, they will sell it for seventy-five cents. The people engaged in those countries in that occupation must live by it, and if they cannot live by it at a high price, they will live by it at a lower price; so that the agricultural interests of this country must depend for their success upon the markets which we have within our own limits and upon our border.

Sir, I shall be satisfied, and I think it will satisfy everybody, if the duties are paid when the foreign goods are entered for consumption, and that is no new idea. In the first tariff that the Congress of the United States under the Confederation submitted to the people, five per cent. was assessed upon all articles imported, to be paid at the time and place of importation. This new-fangled notion, this compromise between our own and foreign systems of industry, had not then gained force. The measure that is now endeavored to be perpetuated upon the industry of the country is one of the same system and plans that predated the monopoly of slavery upon your political system. For years you gave liberty some strength and slavery some strength, and you continued to keep them about even until you know the result. You have had a policy of tariff and a policy of free trade ingrafted upon your industrial system. You must accept one or the other. One or the other of those systems must prevail or both will be destroyed to the extent of the destruction of prosperity.

Now, sir, who are benefited by the foreign connection that is sought to be strengthened by this measure? One half your importers are foreigners who come here to make money and then return to their own country. More than three fourths of your shipping, bringing foreign commodities to this country, is owned by foreigners. It is certainly not for the interest of Congress to pass measures that may be beneficial to anybody except our own people. I was pained the other day to see a measure brought into Congress and passed in regard to the shipping interest, and I was happy indeed to record my vote against it. I did not expect that an interest would war upon itself; but a bill was introduced and passed here by which a thousand ships were disfranchised and rendered out of the pale of American protection under the idea that, because during the war they had accepted the protection which another flag would give them in consequence of our inability to protect them, they must be disfranchised. That was not the real idea at the bottom of the measure. The idea was simply that there should be less competition in the shipping interest of the country; that a thousand ships should be withdrawn from the competition in that business. The consuming interest of this country must take heed, that if one half of the shipping engaged in the carrying trade is driven away from that trade the other half will demand and receive double the amount of freight money that they ever received while the competition was existing. If they are to receive double the amount of freight money, who pays it but the people of the United States? Is it not pretty evident that the idea endeavored to be brought about was to kill off all that you can in order that those who survive may have the field, and glory in the result when they are relieved from competition? A proposition of that sort was submitted to me in 1857. A wealthy capitalist engaged in trade said to me, "I will engage with you to keep off the suspension of specie payments; we can cause most of the smaller men engaged in the trade to fail, and then we will occupy the ground ourselves." In answer to that proposition I informed the gentleman that I preferred to live among the people that were most prosperous; that it was politic, as well as right and just, that others should live if you live. My experience is that it is far better to do business with and to legislate for a people and among a people that are prosperous, happy, and enjoy life, liberty, and happiness, than it is among a people who occupy the reverse position.

Mr. President, if I can ever see the time when the New England system of industry becomes the system of every State in the Union, it will be the happiest day of my life; and whatever aid it may be in my power to give, I shall always be ready to extend, and to devote my time and attention to that purpose. I desire that, because I desire to extend the prosperity of my own State and section, and to introduce that prosperity into every other State of this Union. I know the benefit that it confers upon the people in whose limits those interests are carried on and protected. I know that every interest of that people is made better, that their morals, their religion, their education, their desire to occupy higher grounds and positions in life, everything that goes to ennoble men and women receives a start from those industrial occupations; and it is because of that reason, among others, that I would, if it was in my power, push every manufacturing and mechanical interest of New England into the western and middle States that they might enjoy the benefits and the strength which those States are receiving to-day. I desire that New England should introduce into her system occupations and businesses that would produce the $234,000,000 of goods that are now brought into this country from abroad. There are fields enough for a thousand New Englands, if properly directed, within this country. If the money which is now permitted to leave our borders were retained in the United States, there is business enough for a thousand New Englands in the production of articles the production of which is not now known to our country.

If in the State of my honored friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] engaged in the production of corn and wheat, the people could divide, and one half be occupied with some other pursuit that was profitable, it is reasonable and easy for him to calculate that there would be but half the amount of corn and wheat produced and the same amount of mouths to feed, and, of necessity, the result would be either to increase the price or to afford opportunities to increase the product, and if his people obtained the same percentage of profit upon half the product that they did before upon the whole, they would obtain benefits in proportion. In other words, as often as you can divide the occupations of the people you increase the advantages of each one of their interests. The great idea of other countries, which has made them so successful, (especially in France and in England,) has been that they have not run off upon leading interests so that they have overdone them and have destroyed them. It must become a settled policy with this country that the raw material must remain here. If they are willing in the future, as they have been in the past, that their lands shall be exhausted for the benefit of other nations I shall be disappointed. Take Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, as examples for the southern States, and Ohio and other States as illustrations for the western States. There is not a Senator or anybody here who will say that their productive capacity is as great as it was twenty years ago. You have exhausted your lands for the benefit of other Governments and other peoples. Why, sir, the policy of free trade, which it has been endeavored to foist upon the people, has not one element of fact in it as regards the Government of Great Britain or of France.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, being House joint resolution No. 51, upon which the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will be permitted to finish his argument. The bill which he has moved to reconsider has passed both Houses of Congress; it has been before us now on three several days, and I think it is quite important that the question should be disposed of, and perhaps it is better to finish it at this time. There cannot be much further discussion. After the Senator's argument, I hope there will be a vote this morning.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the special order be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from New York to move to postpone the special order?

Mr. MORRILL. I should hope that the special order would by common consent be laid aside while we take a vote on the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is suggested that the special order for this hour, on which the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor, be laid aside by common consent to enable the Senator from Rhode Island to finish his remarks. Is there any objection to that course? No objection being made, the special order will be laid aside, and the Senator from Rhode Island will proceed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object to the bill on every consideration which has been presented by those who favor it. I can see no reason why this measure should prevail. I object to it on the ground that I stated in the beginning, that it did not come before the Senate properly; that it was sent to a committee that never had entertained jurisdiction of this subject before. It is not a commercial question; it is a question of revenue affecting the industry of this country, of every part of it. It is controlled, it receives its power from a few men who live and who prosper in the great commercial metropolis of the country, and it will operate on the industrial interests of the country as a rudder operates to bring a ship to or to direct its course. I object to it because it is a class interest; a few people obtain advantages from it, and among the few are those who have been enemies of the country, those whose interests are in foreign countries. I object to it because it is a hotbed that produces speculation, enabling parties to carry their goods to any time within the law in order to create a demand, and when that demand has been created, to reap the rewards of the speculation.

I object to this whole system whereby the Government become traders and lessors of stores, of all the appurtenances of a commercial house, rent warehouses and stores, fill them, have storekeepers and have draymen and drays, and have everything that a commercial house has. For what purposes? To carry the resources of this country into foreign countries, to build up the people of foreign countries, and to strengthen Governments that have been for the past century endeavoring to destroy the power which has produced a republican Government. I object to it on that account, because I do not believe that this Congress is intended to operate in business.

I have come to the conclusion, in considering this bill, that it is not for the interest of the country to send men here to represent them who are engaged in a particular class of business. I have a right to make that statement. Imperceptibly to themselves they will introduce into legislation measures that harmonize with the ideas they have formed in the past in carrying on a prosperous business; and especially do I object to it when their honored associates are willing to take their word as law and approve a proposition which may be submitted to them. It is not true that the plan is simply for the benefit of the $10,000,000 of goods that are reexported. That is nothing; it does not amount to anything; it is the feather in the weight of the desire that is intended to be accomplished. It is to have the whole $234,000,000, the amount that is introduced into this country, as a leverage upon all our industrial interests.

Now, sir, if we will not follow the example of every other country that has been prosperous, let us at any rate look at that example. Let us see how England and France have become prosperous. It has been by taking the raw materials of other countries and enhancing their value. It is readily explained. I go down to the restaurant under the Senate Chamber and I buy a dozen raw oysters for thirty cents. Free-trade people would say that is all very well; but I want them cooked, and then they charge me sixty cents. Now, would it be policy for me, as a grower of oysters, to sell a dozen raw oysters for thirty cents and buy back cooked ones for sixty cents? I would like to ask any Senator how I am going to get rich at that operation. That is the policy and plan which has been carried into effect for the last twenty-five years in this country and has exhausted your lands. You have played into the hands of foreigners; you have given them the command of every product of this country, that they might increase its value and sell it to you at double the price that you got for it in the beginning. Just so long as you pursue that policy you will be poor. Just so long as you permit any instrumentality simply for the idea of getting rich to induce you to submit to that sort of thing, you will be poor, and you will be foolish, too.

I object to the bill upon every possible consideration. I object to it upon the ground that it hurts American interests, hurts the people of the United States, and benefits the people of other countries. I speak of that which I know. I know of thirty instances where we are to-day returning to foreign manufacturers thirty or forty per cent. of profit. In the papers of New York or Boston, or anywhere else, these profits never are mentioned; but if a poor, and hitherto poverty-stricken manufacturer is now able to get thirty or forty per cent., the cry is extortion on the part of the industrial interests of the country. I have endeavored to show that where there is no competition in this country, the foreigner obtains the monopoly of your market and increases the price of everything to the consumer. I have endeavored to show that where there is a competition in this country with foreign products, the article is introduced to the consumer cheaper.

I think, then, there is every consideration to influence the Senate, at any rate, to consider well before they present to this country a proposition of this character. All that I have asked of the Senate is that it shall go to the Finance Committee, to be considered by them in connection with the measures they propose to present to the consideration of the Senate in their policy to relieve the industrial interests of the country of some of its burdens. I have asked several times, why this mad haste, why not bring it in with other measures calculated and intended for the benefit of other interests and of the great industrial interests of this country? There is no possible reason. Since the formation of this bonded warehouse system in 1846 you have found constant manipulations with the system, none of which seem to have been satisfactory. In the first place, it was established in 1846; and then in a year or two it was changed. In a year or two after that it was changed again, and then it was changed back to the system of 1846. It is constantly going forward and forward and back and back, to suit the convenience of those who are endeavoring to effect their personal interests in the establishment of a great public measure.

In 1861 the measure adopted was that the duties should be paid within three months, and if not paid within three months twenty-five per cent. additional should be levied and assessed on the duties within two years, and if not paid within two years and the goods remained in bond for three years they were regarded as abandoned to the Government. In 1862 that was changed so that the importers had a year wherein they could pay their duties, and the Government formed a partnership with them by which the goods could be kept in bulk in bond out of the market, so as to make a scarce market, and then when the market was just in the right trim for their purpose they would put them on the market and make a profit of them. In 1862 they had a year, and they got rid of the twenty-five per cent. requirement. They thought then that a year would answer their purpose. Since that they have not been satisfied with the year, but the time has been extended on several occasions by resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives, approved by the President, so that they have had additional time without paying the twenty-five per cent. additional duty which the law of 1861 required to be paid. Now, this proposition is that they shall have three years within which time they may pay the duties.

Thus you see the time was extended from three months to a year and then from a year to three years. There is no knowing what they will ask next. The next proposition may be, "We desire to be relieved entirely from the payments of duties." One successful attack, the accomplishment of one position, induces efforts to accomplish another and another.

I must confess that the passage of this bill in the mad haste in which it was passed has affected me seriously. If the great interests of this country are to be so handled and managed by Congress, I can only say, God protect them. But, sir, there is one satisfaction I have in all this matter, that the American people during the past four years have had a schooling that has brightened their intellect and their perceptions, and they will see what is for their true interests. The power which created slavery for itself, and which antagonized itself against the industry and interest of the country, except wherein they could be for its profit, has been abolished and destroyed; and that poison will forever be kept from their lips, and their eyes will be opened and will continue to be opened from this time forward, and especially so as these aggressive attacks are leveled against their interests. I have an abiding faith that in the future—and that future is not very far off—Senators and Representatives will receive a reminder from their constituents; and I believe that a reminder from constituents comes with great power upon both Senators and Representatives; I am inclined to think that it works wonders at times; and I ask the American people to use a reminder when they find and see from the experiences in their business that it is depressed, that it is not prosperous. In nine cases out of ten that is owing to the unsteadiness of legislation here, which the people in the past have not realized and understood.

Sir, in studying the characters and lives of men who have governed the nations abroad, England, France, and Germany especially, it has occurred to me that the American representative might learn something by imitating their example, by devoting attention to the material interests of the people, by examining into the everyday life of the everyday individual; and instead of soaring so far into the clouds of constitutional law and the practices and commercial relations between States, devoting some portion of his time to the material interests of the people he represents, to prevent them from going astray, to prevent them from having their interests gradually rusted and frittered away by a policy which takes their substance from them as certainly as the leech takes blood from life.

If the policy which has been pursued in the past shall be continued in the future, your lands, as I said before, will be exhausted for the benefit of other people; and the time will come—not in my day, perhaps, but in the day of some of those now living—when you will be poor, indeed. Every man engaged in the farming interest of this country knows full well the disadvantages of owning poor land. Poor land is the meanest property that is known in the category of property.

Now, sir, in conclusion, all I beg is, that this measure may go the Committee on Finance, and that an opportunity may be afforded, when the time of members of Congress is not as much taken up as now with the "society" of the capital, when we may have more leisure to give attention to the great interests which are before us. I want to investigate this subject in view of the light shed upon it by the men who have gone before us. When I opposed this bill in the beginning, I must confess I did not understand it fully; but my eyes were opened when the suggestion was made that "no one opposed it but your predecessor: old Simmons always opposed it." Finding that he had opposed it, I was led into asking the reasons of his opposition; and I have been growing stronger and stronger in the opinions that he endeavored to advance. All I ask is that the bill may go to the Finance Committee, that it may receive attention from them, and then that it come to the Senate, and I shall wish to have something to say upon it then.

Mr. MORRILL. I am so desirous of having the vote taken on this subject that I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate beyond a single minute. This is no question of finance; that suggestion strikes me as absurd. It is a question relating particularly and solely and exclusively to the bonded warehouse system, instituted for the benefit of commerce. That is all there is of it, and it is idle to send such a question to the Finance Committee. The question that my honorable friend from Rhode Island raises about the antagonism between the commercial and manufacturing interests is all misconceived, does not arise on this bill by any possibility; and if it did it is the most inopportune discussion that could possibly be started at the present moment. I pray how does the question of protection or free trade arise? What is the precise point of the bill? Simply whether it is fit and proper to allow the goods, which under the warehousing system are provided to be deposited in the Government warehouses, to lie there one year or two years under certain rules and regulations. That is all there is of it. This system is provided for. This bill does not interfere with it. This simply permits an extension of the time within which the parties may remove the goods by paying an additional sum of ten per cent. It is a very small matter anyhow, and can by no possibility affect the question of free trade or protection. The Secretary of the Treasury was fully consulted on this subject, and he said that no possible injury could come from it, either to the finances or the general interests of the country; and being fully of that opinion, the Committee on Commerce, who gave the subject careful consideration, reported the bill. I ask that we may have a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall only detain the Senate for a moment, merely to refer to the law as I find it in the statutes on this point. I think, under the act of 1857, the warehousing privilege was extended to three years, so that the importer of goods had the right to deposit his goods in bonded warehouse, retain them there for three years, and then put them in market. In 1861, by the act passed in August of that year, at the beginning of the war, the duration of time allowed to importers to withdraw goods from bonded warehouse was reduced to three months, and pretty stringent rules and severe penalties were enacted, intended to compel the importer to withdraw the goods within three months, so that within that time they should contribute to the revenue of the country. In 1862, by the act of July 14, the time was extended to one year, leaving the old penalty under the law of 1861 in force, so that if an importer brought goods into this country and deposited them in warehouse, he might at any time within one year enter them for consumption; and if he did not within one year enter them for consumption, he paid a penalty or additional duty of twenty-five per cent. if he withdrew them in two years; or if he kept them three years in bonded warehouse, they were sold, although he was allowed after the three years to export them from the country upon paying a duty of one per cent.

Now, the bill that is reported from the Committee on Commerce extends the one year to three years, within which, by paying ten per cent. additional duty, the importer may withdraw the goods. I have nothing to say with regard to this branch of the bill, because it is purely a question of commerce, and would take the opinion of the Committee on Commerce on such a matter as readily as I would that of any other committee of the body. But the first clause of this bill does present a question of finance, and a very important one, to which I wish to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Maine. Under the present law, to all the goods imported one year ago now remaining in the bonded warehouses, there is attached an additional duty of twenty-five per cent. The amount of goods in store I have no means of stating. Perhaps gentlemen connected with the mercantile business can state the amount. All goods in bond for more than a year are liable to an additional duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is not the Senator mistaken? That twenty-five per cent. law was repealed by a subsequent statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not find it repealed in the law of 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is repealed substantially.

Mr. SHERMAN. When was the repeal?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In 1862, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I intimated before, the only objection I have to the bill is the question of the remission of the penalty or additional duty. If the law imposing that has been already repealed, the remaining question is one on which I have formed no opinion.

Mr. MORRILL. That is repealed, according to the understanding of the committee, by the act of 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the provision to which I referred, in the law of 1862:

Provided, That all goods which now are or may be deposited in public store or bonded warehouse, after this act takes effect and goes into operation, must be withdrawn therefrom or the duties thereon paid within one year from the date of original importation.

This is understood at the custom-house, I believe, as a repeal of the provision referred to by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORGAN. It is so understood.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I understand that the penalty of twenty-five per cent. is no longer imposed. Then the only question, it seems to me, between these two gentlemen [Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. MORRILL]—it is a kind of friendly contest between commerce and domestic manufactures—is whether we shall extend the time within which imported goods may be taken from bonded warehouses and entered for consumption in the country. This bill proposes to extend it two years; the old law is one year. Upon that question I have not any very definite opinion. I think that if the goods are now entered for consumption we shall get the present rates of duty upon them. If they are not allowed to be entered for consumption they may be exported, and in that case we should lose the duties that are now levied upon them. This is the only view I can take of the question; and in that view, as the goods are now here in our bonded warehouses, it would probably be better to have them entered for consumption; and if this bill will expedite that process, I see no very great objection to it. As a matter of course, the introduction into the market of the stock on hand in the bonded warehouses might tend to some extent to supply the market, and thus exclude domestic manufactures; but all importations do that to a greater or less extent; and with us it is rather a question of revenue than of domestic industry. If, as I supposed when I rose, the additional duty of twenty-five per cent. was still levied upon the goods in the bonded warehouses, I should feel disposed to insist upon the payment of that penalty before the goods were withdrawn; but if that is not now the law, if under the law these parties have the right to export the goods, I see no great objection to our getting the duties fixed by law and allowing them to enter into the consumption of the country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to discuss this question, but I think that the discussion which has already taken place should satisfy the Senate that the bill ought to be further considered. It has been considered by one committee; but I do not agree with the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] that this is altogether a commercial question. It is certainly a question affecting the coffers of the Government, when we propose to place it in the power of men not to pay us taxes for three years. Suppose it was proposed to allow the manufacturer three years within which to pay his income tax, that would be not a question of manufactures but a question of finance, because its immediate effect would be upon the Treasury. It seems to me that this is a time when we should adopt a policy that will secure the largest returns to the Treasury; and I am not able to agree with the learned Senator from Maine that this is altogether a commercial question. Without understanding it very well, I am inclined to vote in support of the proposition which has been so ably maintained by the Senator from Rhode Island. I think there is a great deal of force in this proposition. This bill would enable the importers to pile up in the Government warehouses for a period of three years, if they thought it was their interest, their importations, which would be an accumulated capital ready to be thrown upon the market of this country at any time; and certainly Senators will admit that that would be a constant embarrassment to the manufacturer. Would any Senator wish his own interest all the time to be under the shadow of a greater interest which the Government provides for? It seems to me there is force in the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not agree with him in his propositions in respect to protection; I do not agree with him in the proposition that every producer can be a manufacturer. In Indiana we are necessarily an agricultural people, not because we have that "meanest property" in the world, poor land, but because we have altogether rich land, and our labor must of necessity go into the cultivation of the soil.

I merely wished to say that I intended to support the proposition, and it will certainly do no harm to let the question be examined by the Finance Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Have you in your State any of the poor land spoken of by the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; Indiana in that respect is next to Missouri. With Missouri and Ohio, she has no poor land. There is a little wet land in one or two localities—

Mr. MORRILL. "Swamp" land? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes. Swamp land that, I believe, the State got under the law of 1850; but with that exception the land invites the people to its cultivation. The effect of legislation is apparent in regard to one interest in our country. I protested against it at the time, and was sorry to see a Senator, representing a neighboring State, giving his powerful influence in favor of the proposition that was made to impose a tax of two dollars on whisky. That is a tax on the corn produced by my constituents, and by his constituents, and by the constituents of the Senator from Illinois, who also represents nothing but good land, so far as he represents property at all.

The people of those States and the people of Kentucky are largely interested in the production of corn. There was but one mode in which we could manufacture it, and that was in the production of whisky. This body deliberately said that we should not do it. I believe that the Senator from Ohio really thought that two dollars a gallon would produce a large revenue to the Treasury, but it is a mistake; the interest to-day is dead; the production is as nothing, and now, instead of getting one dollar a bushel for our corn, we are only able to get from twenty to forty cents for it. A gentleman from Illinois told me the other day that on one farm which he owned last year his taxes were $400, and he got a dollar a bushel for his corn, and this year, because of the county bounties and township bounties, &c., his taxes were $800 on that piece of land and he got twenty cents a bushel for his corn, so that in fact his taxes are increased a thousand per cent., and that in part owing to the fact that you have prohibited the possibility of manufacturing the corn. It is a heavy and bulky article, which cannot bear transportation. But I did not intend to discuss any of these questions; I rose simply to say that I should support the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CLARK. I think this question reaches much further than some gentlemen seem to apprehend. Take a simple illustration; suppose a very large manufacturing house in Europe chooses to fill your bonded warehouse with goods for three years; you manufacture the same goods in your own country, and whenever your manufacturer comes upon the market to sell his articles, that large establishment empty that bonded warehouse upon the market at auction, and where is your manufacturer? I state not an imaginary case; I state an actual fact, what is known to be done. You thus give the men who import three years to play upon your manufacturers. This should not be done without consideration. I have always been opposed to an extension of the time allowed for goods to lie in bonded warehouse. I think one year is too long; I would not give them one instant over three months for that purpose. When these men have three months in which to choose to put their goods upon the market or not, it seems to me they have all they ought to have. But now they have one year, and this bill proposes to give them two years more, or three years altogether in which to keep their goods in warehouse, during which time to compete with your manufacturers and undersell them. No new manufactory in this country can live under that system. I happen to know an instance where a large manufactory in this country was springing up, and the only way they could compete with the German houses was to go into the markets at auction at a great sacrifice, and drive them out at a vast loss of their own capital. The result of this bill will be to give the importers not only one year but three years during which to play this operation upon you. I think we ought to consider before we pass such a bill. I think the Senator from Maine does not mean any such result, but I fear he will have it; I fear that what has been will be again, and I ask the Senate to let us consider for awhile.

Mr. MORRILL. If this measure is likely to involve a discussion which was not anticipated, it is hardly fair, perhaps, to the Senator from Missouri, and I call therefore for the order of the day.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER.] On this question the Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. With the indulgence of my friend I desire to submit an amendment which will be in order before we can be called upon to act upon his amendment. I propose to add words to the proviso recommended by the committee. Of course it is in order to perfect the original proposition before we come to the question of striking out. My object now is to amend the original proposition of the committee by adding these words, "and they shall be exempt from taxation of all kinds;" so as to make the phrase read, "all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation, and they shall be exempt from taxation of all kinds."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order. It is not to perfect an amendment before action is had upon it. The Senator before offered an amendment to strike out the whole of the resolution and insert something else, and to that amendment an amendment was proposed. Now the Senator from Massachusetts desires to amend the original resolution, which is not in order at this time.

Mr. SUMNER. The question is on striking out the original resolution of the committee, and I submit, with deference to the Chair, that before we come to the question of striking out, it is in order to add to the proposition of the committee or to subtract from it; in short, to amend it in any way, and that must be considered before we come to the main proposition of striking out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to withdraw the amendment heretofore offered by him?

Mr. SUMNER. I do, for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order. The Senator can withdraw his amendment for the purpose of proposing to modify or perfect the original resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, then let it stand so. I wish to have a vote on this as a preliminary question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order, and the question is on the amendment now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDERSON addressed the Senate, and without concluding gave way to

Mr. DOOLITTLE, who moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

[The publication of Mr. HENDERSON's speech is deferred until it shall have been concluded.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see the necessity of having an executive session at this hour. We can sit until five o'clock. We shall never get through in this way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We have some Indian treaties that ought to be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. B. F. MORRIS.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ORTH moved that his colleague, Mr. STILLWELL, have leave of absence for one week from Thursday next.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House on Friday, the morning-hour business of Monday was transferred to this day. Committees will be called for reports, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The committees were called, but no reports were submitted.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the call of States for resolutions, commencing with the State of California, where the call was arrested on last Monday.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON MINES, ETC.

Mr. HIGBY submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining be allowed to have a clerk, who shall receive the usual compensation fixed by the House for clerks of committees.

On seconding the demand for the previous question the House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest to the gentleman to allow me to move an amendment, for a clerk to be allowed to each member.

Mr. HIGBY. I want the resolution to pass and not to be defeated.

The SPEAKER, (no quorum having voted,) ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HIGBY and LE BLOND.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 48.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative to make a quorum.

So the call for the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The House divided on the adoption of the resolution; and there were—ayes 54, noes 49.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 64, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Darling, Davis, Dixon, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, James Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kuykendall, Ladin, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, McNair, Miller, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeldt, Smith, Spalding, Stillwell, Strouse, Taylor, Thayer, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Beaman, Bergen, Boutwell, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Grinnell, Harris, Hill, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, James M. Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Niblack, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Taber, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Hurt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, and Williams—64.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Culver, Dawes, Deftrees, Delano, Denison, Dumont, Eliot, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hogan, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Jones, Longyear, Lynch, McIndoe, Mercer, Newell, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ritter, Shanklin, Starr, Francis Thomas, Voorhees, Warner, Winfield, and Wright—51.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask whether this resolution authorizes the payment of a salary to this clerk from the commencement of this Congress, or from the present time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House, having been passed under the previous question.

IMPROVEMENT OF ZUMBRO RIVER, MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill granting lands to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the improvement of Zumbro river, in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MEXICO.

Mr. WHALEY submitted the following preamble and resolutions, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas this House at its last session, interpreting the sentiment of the American people, passed a resolution indorsing the traditional policy of this Government toward the republics of the continent, and reprobatly in unmistakable language the erection of a monarchy upon the ruins of the neighboring republic of Mexico; and whereas the flagrant infraction of this American continental policy occurred while this nation was in a conflict for its own unity, which conflict is now happily ended; Therefore,

Resolved, 1. That this House do hereby reaffirm the resolution of last session, and declare that the establishment of a political protectorate by France in behalf of an Austrian prince, over the republic of Mexico, and the introduction of a scheme of policy which carries with it a right to interfere with our own as well as in the affairs of all the republics of this continent, is a measure to which this country can never submit, and which should be resisted by all the means in our power.

2. That to the end of making good this resolution, the President solicit the alliance of all the republics of this continent, and the use of all the means at their command.

Mr. BANKS. I move to refer these resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been moved.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make that motion.

Mr. WHALEY. I decline to yield.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, it was not seconded.

Mr. BANKS. I now move to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If debate arises it goes over.

Mr. ROGERS. I withdraw the motion to lay the subject on the table.

The question recurring on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to refer, it was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, and under the operation thereof the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred, and to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ESUTCHEONS OF WEST VIRGINIA AND NEVADA.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer another resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be directed to cause to be painted in the square panels of glass in the ceiling of the House of Representatives the esutcheons of the States of West Virginia and Nevada, and that the necessary appropriations be made therefor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. LATHAM. I offer the same resolution, and demand the previous question thereon.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Can the resolution be divided?

The SPEAKER. It cannot; it must be so framed that the two parts will stand independently by themselves in order to be divided.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. CHAVES submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for placing upon suitable sites of reservation the following tribes of Indians, namely, the several bands of Utah Indians, Jicarilla Apaches, Comanches, Kiowas, and Prairie Apaches.

LAND OFFICES IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. DENNY introduced a bill for the relief of land offices in Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WAGON ROAD IN COLORADO.

Mr. BRADFORD introduced a bill for the construction of a wagon road from Denver city, Colorado Territory, via Pueblo, to Fort Garland, in the San Louis Park; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is taking up resolutions which were offered under the rule, debate having arisen thereon.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. No question of privilege can be called up to-day during the morning hour, it being the same as on Monday.

Mr. KASSON. As I understand it, last Monday morning the State of Iowa was not included in the call of the States. I have a resolution in my hand, supposing that Iowa would be the first State called in order to conclude the call.

The SPEAKER. Iowa was called, and also Wisconsin which succeeded it.

Mr. KASSON. I thought Wisconsin came before Iowa.

The SPEAKER. In the printed list Iowa comes first and Wisconsin afterward. Both were called last Monday week.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House tendering thanks to Hon. George Bancroft for the appropriate memorial address delivered by him on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes;" when the Speaker signed the same.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of the following resolution, offered on the 21st of December last by Mr. SMITH, of Kentucky, and which laid over under the rule, debate arising thereon:

Resolved, That James M. Johnson, claiming to be a member-elect to the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the third district, State of Arkansas, be admitted to the privileges of the floor of the House during the pendency of his claim as a member thereof.

Mr. SMITH. I merely wish to remark in regard to this gentleman from Arkansas, Colonel Johnson, that he was an applicant for a seat upon this floor in the Thirty-Eighth Congress; his credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections, and while that committee was considering whether he was entitled to a seat or not, the House granted him the privileges of the floor. He is a gentleman known to the majority of this House, and one recognized as entirely worthy in every respect at least to the privileges of the floor. He was one of the original loyalists in the State of Arkansas, and one who never for a moment surrendered a single opinion or a single thought or feeling to the rebellion. He enlisted in our Army and served for over three years with distinction to himself, commanding a regiment on various occasions; and he feels, and has so expressed himself to me, that if he were denied at this time the same privilege that he received from the House before, which was merely one of courtesy, it would be a reflection on his loyalty which was so evidently manifested all the time during the war in a very rebellious State. I therefore hope the House will adopt this resolution and grant him this privilege.

So far as his credentials are concerned, they have been referred to the joint committee on reconstruction, and that committee can discuss the propriety of admitting him as a member just as well with this courtesy extended to him as though it were denied. It is unnecessary to debate this question as the remarks I have made show the House precisely what the facts are. I call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the previous question for five minutes. I want to say a single word upon it.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to make a further statement, and I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

At the last session of Congress, Colonel Johnson was paid his mileage and salary during the pendency of his claim here, by a resolution of the House, and during three years and a half, as I have already suggested, he commanded a regiment in the United States Army.

While I am upon the floor, I will allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to make his remarks.

Mr. STEVENS. I observe that this resolution proposes to admit some gentleman in the character of a claimant for a seat from a State which we have not yet admitted to be entitled to representation.

I made, some time since, perhaps not a very fortunate motion to admit five or six gentlemen without naming where they were from, or in what character they were here. I had known some of them here and elsewhere, but I did not venture to state that they were claimants for seats from any State. If I had I should have considered it a very bad precedent. It seems, however, to have been found out that some of them are claimants from Tennessee, and hence that unfortunate precedent has led to this resolution, aggravated by calling this gentleman a claimant for a seat from the State of Arkansas.

Now, I think it is premature to admit any of these gentlemen. The idea of admitting claimants as claimants from any one of these defunct States is monstrous, in my judgment, while the matter is still before the joint committee for investigation.

If the gentleman from Kentucky desires to call the previous question I have no objection, but I desire to move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. SMITH. I have the floor now, and cannot yield for that purpose.

With all due deference to the opinion of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I will say that he and I differ very materially upon the point he suggests, whether the State of Arkansas is defunct or not. We have differed since I have been here sitting in Congress, and as long as he entertains the opinions he now does we will continue to differ. He has heard me almost as often as I have heard him upon this question, presenting our different views in regard to this matter. I declare, as a rule of the Government, as a principle of the Constitution, and as a precedent of Congress up to this session, that these States have all been recognized as States, and not as defunct, and that these men have been invited to the privileges of this floor by a solemn vote of this House; and, further, sir, those who claimed seats from Louisiana and Arkansas in the last Congress were paid their salary up to the time the question was decided.

And further than that, sir, for over two years after the commencement of the war, not only claimants, but members were permitted to take their seats from those States which were declared to be in rebellion, and which had passed ordinances of secession.

I am proud, and it will be a source of gratification to me in the future, that I can rise in my place and declare as a great fundamental principle, one which has been maintained by arms, that no State is out of this Union, or ever has been, and that no State has become defunct by the rebellion.

It is a great and glorious privilege that I claim. It is a grand and glorious principle which was handed down to me by the fathers of the Revolution, and which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will by and by acknowledge if God permits him to live a few years longer.

Gentlemen may say what they please about the admission of members from the States lately in rebellion, but the question is to be decided by us. This question of privilege and courtesy is not one that involves the eligibility of a man to a seat upon this floor. I have never asked that a man who has waged war against this Government, who has attempted to aid in its overthrow, should be admitted here either as a matter of privilege or a matter of right. But I have always held that one who comes before us bearing upon him the scars of battles fought for the maintenance of the Government, who has gone through this great campaign for independence and liberty, who has borne aloft the same flag that we have attempted to maintain, should, as a matter of courtesy, be admitted to the privileges of the floor in the national council. I say it is but a poor boon when granted, and we reflect upon our gratitude if we do not grant to him what we have granted to others.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. SMITH. I will presently; and here I may be permitted to say that when we wanted men from Arkansas and Louisiana and Alabama—I remember it well, and so does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]—none were louder in their praises of the devotion of these men to the Union than was the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and others who sit upon that side of the House, and also those upon this side of the House, because there is no division upon that subject in reference to the geography of this House. We all love to hear of those men from the South. And our generals and soldiers from the North wrote letters back to us that we read at our desks how those men were coming from their homes, from their mountain fastnesses and valleys, and rallying around the flag of their country and giving their aid to our side of the question.

But now when the war is over, the monstrous idea has been promulgated in this House that wherever you find a white man in the South there you find an enemy of the Government; and wherever you find a black man there you find a friend of the Government. That is a slander upon loyal men like Mr. Johnson; a slander that I throw back with indignation and contempt.

I now yield for a short time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. As I intend to vote for a proposition like this in the case of loyal men from Arkansas, I desire two or three minutes to state the reasons that will control my action. The first of all is that we shall be entirely unable to convince the people of this country that we have heard both sides of this question as long as we keep loyal men at arm's length from our presence, and so distant that we cannot have any interchange of views in regard to the interests they represent.

For myself, I stand committed to the admission of Representatives from no one State of this Union lately in rebellion except one that stands in an exceptional relation, and which was regarded as a State of this Union at the national Republican convention last held at Baltimore. I refer to the State of Tennessee. Touching the other States I am at perfect liberty to vote for or against their representation here just as my own convictions may prompt me.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. I must be excused at the present time. Now, when men come here like Colonel Johnson, whose hands are not red with the blood of loyal men, and if red at all are red with the blood of rebels, for us to reject them from our presence as unclean men, not fit even to make a showing of their case, is an outrage upon the popular sense of justice in this country, against which we cannot sustain ourselves before the people.

I have always been taught to hear the other side, according to the old maxim, audi alteram partem, and I am unwilling, sitting as a legislator, to decide in a case of which I have not heard both sides, as I should be, as a judge upon the bench, to decide upon an ex parte statement, when both parties were before me.

The real question, it seems to me, which has not yet been passed upon by this House, or by any convention of the party to which I belong is, whether the power that is vacated by the usurpation of a rebel State government ascends to the United States Government in Congress assembled, or falls as a lapsed power into the hands of the people who are in allegiance to the Government of the United States within the particular State. I hold, sir, that the power of reorganization lapses to the loyal people within that jurisdiction, even if they number but one in every hundred. Other gentlemen on this floor hold that it lapses, so to speak, to the Government of the United States in Congress assembled, though in this view they are without any precedent in the history of the Government to sustain them. Far more logical is the position of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that our power is that of conquerors, than to maintain that the power is transferred to the Congress of the United States from an original State of this Union whose government has been usurped.

Now, sir, on this question, and on the question of loyalty, and on all the questions involved, I desire that a loyal man, a fighting loyal man, whom the loyal people have sent to represent them here, shall be permitted to exchange his views with me and with us all on this floor before we decide against him. For that reason I ask that he may be allowed the privileges of the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to make a speech on this question; and as I desire the resolution to be acted on at once, I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. LE BLOND. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 69, not voting 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Bontwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Roder W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farasworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, William Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIntire, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Plants, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bergen, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Culom, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Eckley, Eldridge, Farguhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hill, James R. Hubbell, James Humphrey, James M. Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orin, Phelps, Pike, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Sanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, and Whaley—69.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Barker, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Cobb, Culver, Delano, Denton, Dumont, Hogan, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Ketcham, McKuer, Mereur, Patterson, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Starr, Francis Thomas, Voorhees, William B. Washburn, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—33.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF CITIZENS.

Mr. BINGHAM reported from the joint committee on reconstruction a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —. The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and the question was on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Can this joint resolution be presented and considered at the present time without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The joint committee on reconstruction is authorized to report at any time, and the report comes up for consideration at once, to be disposed of by the action of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. The joint resolution having now been read a first and second time, I ask that it be printed and be made the special order for next Monday, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. There are now two special orders, the bankrupt bill and the loan bill, which antedate this. As special orders must be taken up in the order of priority, this joint resolution may not be reached at the time named.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order. Has the committee on reconstruction the right not only to report at all times, but the right also, under that power given to them by order of the House, to make special orders at all times?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. BROOKS. It then requires unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. On ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time. Mr. BROOKS. It may be done as well today, if it is to be done at all.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to my colleague on the committee to move that the joint resolution be recommitted, and we can consider it whenever it may be desired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the joint committee on reconstruction, and that it be ordered to be printed; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. Permit me to ask a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the use of reporting from a committee, and on the same day moving that the same subject be recommitted to the same committee? Why recommit to a committee which has already made up its mind?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman ought to understand the use of it. If there had been no objection on the gentleman's part, we would have made it a special order for Monday next, after the morning hour. If recommitted to the joint committee on reconstruction, this being a privileged matter, and the committee being authorized to report at any time, the committee may designate the day on which they will report it back and ask for its consideration and the action of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand; the committee can report it back and put it through at any time.

Mr. BINGHAM. We do not propose to put it through at any time without a fair hearing. The gentleman is not to prejudice this matter by any remark like that he has just made.

Mr. BROOKS. I want the country to understand how these things are managed.

Mr. BINGHAM. And I want it to understand who are opposed to enforcing the written guarantees of the Constitution.

Mr. BROOKS. I want it to understand that the committee can report at any time, when nobody knows, and then pass it under the previous question—a system of gag law.

Mr. BINGHAM. There has been no proposition of that kind made, and the gentleman's remark is wholly gratuitous.

Mr. BROOKS. The facts are known, and the country will judge between us.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was recommitted to the joint committee on reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

LINCOLN EULOGIES.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved, &c. That one thousand copies of the memorial records of the nation's tribute to Abraham Lincoln, published by W. H. & O. H. Morrison, and compiled by B. F. Morris, containing the historical and official facts of his assassination and obsequies; the inauguration of Andrew Johnson as President of the United States; the action of members of Congress in the capital on the 17th day of April, 1865; the official orders of the various Departments of the Government, including those of the Army and Navy, on his death; the tributes of citizens of various States represented at Washington; of the courts of the District of Columbia, of foreign nations, and of American citizens abroad; and the orations of Hon. George Bancroft, at New York; of Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives, at Chicago, Illinois; and of Rev. Bishop Matthew Simpson, D.D., at Springfield, Illinois, on the death and services of President Lincoln; together with the memorial services held in honor of his memory by the Congress of the United States on the 12th day of February, 1866, and the oration of Hon. George Bancroft delivered on that occasion, be published for the use of Congress.

The SPEAKER stated that the resolution would be referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

PAY OF ASSISTANT ASSESSORS.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of the assistant assessors of the sixth district of Kentucky, asking for increase of pay, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 143) for the relief of Charles F. Anderson;

An act (H. R. No. 36) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, and additional appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and

An act (H. R. No. 204) to regulate the registering of vessels.

BREVET APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution in relation to brevet appointments and commissions in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that hereafter every brevet appointment or commission conferred upon an officer of the Army shall state for what distinguished act of gallantry or meritorious conduct the same was conferred, and that the annual Army Register shall contain hereafter, appended to the name of each officer so brevetted, such particular act of gallantry or meritorious conduct for which his brevet was granted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELLEN SANDERSON.

Mr. SHELLABARGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Ellen Sanderson, widow of Colonel John P. Sanderson, the provost marshal general of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID DREXLER.

Mr. PAINE asked leave to withdraw from the files of the House certain papers in the case of the claim of David Drexler, of Louisiana, for losses incurred from military operations, copies of the same to be left on file.

No objection being made, leave was granted.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of Congress of August 16, 1842, and August 18, 1856, a report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending September 30, 1865.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the report be laid on the table and printed, and that five thousand extra copies thereof be printed.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

MICHIGAN CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the majority and minority reports of the select committee on the Michigan contested seats. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] wish to be heard on the subject, after which the contestants will be heard if they choose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to state that the contestant, Mr. Baldwin, is quite unwell, and not able to speak.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When we reach that point, after these other gentlemen are heard, that question may be considered.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to know whether Mr. Baldwin will be permitted to have his speech printed without delivering it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I presume there will be no objection; but it will be time enough to raise that question when Mr. Baldwin gets the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. If he is not permitted that privilege, he would prefer that the House should postpone the subject until he is able to speak. He is not able this morning to do so.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I shall make no objection.

The Clerk read the majority report, as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Augustus C. Baldwin, claiming a seat in the Thirty-Ninth Congress as Representative from the fifth congressional district of Michigan, report as follows:

There is no question of fact, and only one of law, involved in this contest. The constitution of the State of Michigan, article seven, section one, reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. In all elections, every white male citizen, every white male inhabitant residing in the State on the 24th day of June, 1835; every white male inhabitant residing in the State on the 1st day of January, 1850, who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof, six months preceding an election, or who has resided in this State two years and six months, and declared his intention as aforesaid, and every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent, a native of the United States, and not a member of any tribe, shall be an elector and entitled to vote; but no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election, unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

The first and second sections of an act of the Legislature of that State, passed February 5, 1864, are as follows:

"Sec. 1. The people of the State of Michigan enact, That every white male citizen or inhabitant of this State, of the age of twenty-one years, possessing the qualifications named in article seven, section one, of the constitution of the State of Michigan, in the military service of the United States or of this State, in the Michigan regiments, companies, or batteries, shall be entitled to vote at all of the elections authorized by law, as provided in this act, and every such citizen or inhabitant shall thus be entitled, in the manner herein prescribed, whether at the time of voting he shall be within the limits of this State or not.

"Sec. 2. Every soldier belonging to Michigan regiments and batteries or companies, in the military service of this State or of the United States, or volunteer soldiers, residents of Michigan, belonging to regiments, batteries, or companies, present on the day of election from other States, including officers and their staffs, surgeons, and assistant surgeons, chaplains and commissioners appointed under this act, shall, if possessed of the qualifications set forth in section one of this act, be entitled to the benefits of the provisions thereof."

Under this act of the Legislature, a large number of votes were cast by soldiers outside the limits of the State. If these votes can be lawfully counted, Mr. Trowbridge has a majority of the whole, and is entitled to the seat; if not, Mr. Baldwin, having a majority of the home vote, is entitled to it. It will be observed that the elector is prohibited by the constitution of the State (taking the interpretation of its supreme court as correct) from voting outside of the township or ward in which he resides, but by the act of the Legislature is allowed, when absent in the military service of the country, to vote even outside the State. Here is an unmistakable conflict of authority. The constitution plainly prohibits what the Legislature as plainly permits. The one authorizes the election to be held only in the township or ward—the other at military headquarters. The power to act at all in the premises, so far as concerns Representatives in Congress, is derived from article one, section four, of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Here the power is conferred upon the Legislature. But what is meant by "the Legislature?" Does it mean the legislative power of a State, which would include a convention authorized to prescribe fundamental law, or does it mean the Legislature eo nomine, as known in the political history of the country? The committee have adopted the latter construction. At the time the Constitution of the United States was written, there existed in the thirteen States for which it was designed, Legislatures, created or restrained by some fundamental law, in the shape of charters or constitutions, very much as they exist in the several States now. With this fact before them, it is not probable that the framers of the Constitution, if they intended to confer this power upon State organic conventions, would have chosen some word less liable to misconception. It is also apparent, from the manner in which this word is used in other parts of the instrument, that its framers recognized a wide difference between a continuing Legislature and a convention temporarily clothed with power to prescribe fundamental law. Article five provides that Congress "shall call a convention for proposing amendments"

"on application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States." Also that amendments shall be valid when "ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions of three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress." Article seven provides that "the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." The Convention closed their labors with the following resolution: "Resolved, That the preceding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled; and that it is the opinion of this Convention that it should afterward be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature."

In these extracts the words "Legislature" and "convention" are both used to denote different legislative bodies, and in such contrast as to clearly indicate that the former is employed in its historic rather than in its normal sense. In article one, section two, the words of the Constitution are, "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Did anybody ever hear of a constitutional convention in the history of this country composed of two houses? Article one, section three, provides that "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." In article two, section one, it is said "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors" &c. In section eight of article one, "the consent of the Legislature of a State" is required before the United States can purchase places for forts, &c. Again, in article four, section four, it is said that "on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) Congress shall protect each State against domestic violence." It will hardly be claimed that a constitutional convention could perform the duties thus conferred upon the Legislature; much less that it could forbid the Legislature eo nomine from discharging them after its own dissolution.

But the legislation of Michigan may be sustained as against the constitution of that State even if the word Legislature is to be taken in its most enlarged sense. Whatever power the convention of that State possessed to prescribe the places of holding elections for Representatives in Congress was derived, not like its other powers, from the people, but from the Constitution of the United States, and that, too, because it was a constructive Legislature. The power conferred is a continuing power. It is not used up when once exercised, but survives the dissolution of the convention. The words of the Constitution are as potent then as before, and if there is any legislative body in the State that can be properly called a Legislature they appertain to it as strongly as to any prior legislative body. They do not authorize any convention or Legislature to tie the hands of its successors. The people authorize a convention to do that where they (the people) have power, but certainly the people of Michigan had no power to enlarge or restrict the language of the Constitution of the United States. This view of the case entirely harmonizes what was at first supposed to be a partially adverse precedent in the case of Shiel vs. Thayer, from the State of Oregon.

It was said in argument that the Legislature might abuse this power, but that does not disprove its existence. It would be equally liable to that objection if lodged in any other department of government. It is not claimed, however, that in this instance the power was abused. Mr. Baldwin conceded that to allow a vote to be cast by a soldier detained in the service of his country was a very proper use of the power, provided the Legislature possessed it. If, however, it should in the future be abused, Congress has entire authority to correct it.

But, again, the contestant claims that a State has the power to prescribe the qualifications of electors, and may exercise it by an organic convention, to the exclusion of the Legislature. The committee are not disposed to controvert this position. That power has been conceded to the States, and exercised by them in the manner suggested, from the beginning of the Government to the present time. But it does not follow, as the contestant supposes, that the place of holding the election for a Representative in Congress may be prescribed as one of the electoral qualifications. Control over the place of voting is lodged in the Legislature by the unmistakable language of the Constitution, and cannot, however disguised by names or circumlocution of words, be transferred to another department of government. Now, the constitution of Michigan either fixes the place of holding the election or it does not. If it does not, there is no conflict between the law and the constitution, and the argument is at an end. If it does, then, as before shown, the convention which adopted it entirely exceeded its power, unless such convention is to be considered a Legislature by construction; and in that event its power, as has also been shown, was just as ample as that of any subsequent Legislature, and no more. The power to prescribe the place, whether called a qualification, limitation, or condition, is still vested in what the Constitution calls "the Legislature," and there it must remain. It cannot be divested by giving it another name, however apt it may be.

The committee, then, submit the following resolution, and recommend its adoption:

Resolved, That Rowland E. Trowbridge is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the fifth congressional district in Michigan.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask that the minority report, which I had the honor to submit, be now read.

The Clerk read the minority report, as follows:

The undersigned, having carefully considered the questions of law involved in this case, has come to the conclusion that Mr. Baldwin was duly elected, and is entitled to the seat which he claims.

It is admitted that of the votes cast within the State of Michigan for Representative in Congress from the fifth congressional district of that State Mr. Baldwin had a majority. It is also admitted that a large number of citizens of Michigan who were out of the State, and in the service of the United States on the day of said election, in pursuance of the provisions of an act of the Legislature of Michigan, approved February 5, 1864, voted at the places where they happened to be on the day of election; and that if these votes can be lawfully counted, Mr. Trowbridge had a majority, and was duly elected. If they cannot be lawfully counted, Mr. Baldwin was duly elected, and is entitled to his seat.

The question submitted is, therefore, purely a legal one, and involves some nice questions of constitutional law.

Article seven, section one, of the constitution of the State of Michigan, after prescribing the qualification of electors, provides that "no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election, unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

The supreme court of Michigan, in a case arising out of the identical election out of which this contest has arisen, (the case of The People ex rel. Daniel S. Twitchell vs. Amos C. Blodgett), have construed this provision of their constitution to mean that the elector shall be personally present, in the township in which he resides, on the day of election, and there in person present his ballot at the place of voting; and that the act of the Legislature of February 5, 1864, "is in direct conflict with the constitution, and for this reason void." This case was very thoroughly discussed and considered by the court, the judges all giving separate opinions, and it seems to me impossible to read the case without arriving at the same conclusion. This is the highest and most authoritative exposition of that provision of the State constitution that can be given. The supreme court of Michigan is the most authoritative expounder of the constitution and laws of the State, and all other tribunals, including even the Supreme Court of the United States itself, are bound to follow and abide by the construction which the State court has placed upon their own constitution.

I will not dwell upon this point in the case, as I do not understand the majority of the committee, or, indeed, any one in behalf of the claims of the sitting member, to seriously dispute the correctness of the construction placed upon their constitution by the supreme court of the State. It is admitted, I believe, that the act of the Legislature of February 5, 1864, was in direct conflict with the organic law of the State.

It is contended, however, that the Legislature, in determining the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, are not bound to conform to the provisions of the organic law of the State. That they have a power above and wholly independent of their State constitution. And this power is supposed to be found in section four of article one of the Federal Constitution, which is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

In determining the proper construction to be placed on this clause of the Federal Constitution, it is important to inquire, first, what was the object of the framers of that instrument in infringing into its such a provision? Why was it deemed necessary and proper? It is hardly possible that there can be two opinions in regard to this.

The Convention had provided for a Federal Senate and House of Representatives, in which the legislative power of the proposed Government was to reside. The effective organization and continuance of these bodies were necessary to the very existence of the Government under the plan proposed. To have a Senate and House of Representatives it was necessary that members thereof must be elected at regular and stated periods; and it was argued with great force that a majority of the States, becoming refractory, might, by the simple act of refusing to provide the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, and thereby defeating the election of these officers, suspend the action, destroy the power, or even blot out of existence the Federal Government.

It became necessary, therefore, absolutely necessary, to secure the continued existence and effectiveness of the Federal Government, to reserve to Congress the power at any time by law to make or alter such regulations. The object was to secure to the Federal Government, for its own safety, the due election of these officers; not to confer upon the States, or any department thereof, any powers whatever, or to interfere in any way with them in their mode of electing these officers, as long as the exercise of this power was left to the States. The object manifestly was simply to leave to the States the power to determine the times, places, and manner of holding these elections, until Congress saw proper to exercise the powers conferred upon it for that purpose.

But it is argued that this power was by express terms left, not to the States simply, but to the Legislatures thereof, and that this is such a limitation upon the people of the States that they have no power to restrict their Legislatures in the exercise of this right conferred upon them by the Federal Constitution; but I submit, with all due respect, that not only the history and object of the section under consideration but the proper definition of the term "Legislature," as therein used, show the fallacy of this construction.

The "Legislature" of a State, in its fullest and broadest sense, signifies that body in which all the legislative powers of a State reside, and that body is the people themselves who exercise the elective franchise, and upon their power of legislation there is no limitation or restriction, except such as may be found in the Federal Constitution, or such as they may themselves provide by the organic law of the State. When they assemble in convention, which in large communities is from necessity done by the agency of delegates or representatives of the people, the whole legislative power of the State is then vested in such convention. It can abolish, or in whole or in part abrogate, the proceedings of the "General Assembly," or "Legislative Council," or "General Court," or whatever may be the designation of that subordinate body in which is usually lodged a portion or residuum of the legislative power of a State. Indeed, the people of a State might provide for the periodical assembling of their convention, which would exercise and perform all legislative powers and duties without the intervention of that body of limited and restricted powers, popularly called a Legislature, but which in the constitutions of most of the States is called by some other name. It is variously designated a "General Assembly," a "Legislative Council," a "General Court," and the like, and is nowhere understood to hold in its grasp all the legislative powers of a State.

In Missouri, during the late rebellion, the State convention continued its existence for years, performing all the ordinary acts of legislation, and its power to do so is not questioned. That that was a "Legislature" within the sense of the term as it is used in this clause of the Federal Constitution will hardly be controverted; and indeed every State convention called by the people to determine the form of government, or the powers and duties of the various officers thereby created, is a Legislature, and performs many of the ordinary acts of legislation.

Indeed, it is the Legislature par excellence of the State, and that other body usually created by it, whether called a "General Assembly," "General Court," or otherwise, is the creature of this paramount Legislature, and is liable to be modified or annihilated whenever this "Legislature" proper—the convention of a State—shall again assemble. This secondary or subordinate body is the creature of the organic law of the State, owes its existence to it, and can rightfully do nothing in contravention of its provisions.

If, then, this section of the Federal Constitution can be construed to refer to this secondary or subordinate legislative body of a State, it must be held to mean that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, such Legislature acting in subordination and in conformity to that organic law to which it owes its own existence. If the State constitution has fixed no limitation, the power of the Legislature is ample and complete. But if the constitution has fixed limits this Legislature cannot transcend them, but must act within the limits prescribed, and if it goes beyond them its action is to that extent absolutely void.

Indeed, from the adoption of the Federal Constitution until this time, it was never before contended, as far as I am informed, that the clause in question conferred upon that body in a State in which was reposed that residuum of legislative power, not exercised by the State convention, power to act utterly independent of, and in utter disregard of, the State constitution, by virtue of which alone it has any existence. The people have everywhere supposed that they had the power to fix a limitation upon the action of their Legislature, in determining the times, places, and manner of holding elections for all officers. They have exercised this power in most of the States by fixing limitations in their State constitutions, and in every instance, I believe, where a conflict has been found to exist in this respect between the State constitution and an act of their Legislature, the constitution has, by courts and legislative bodies, been sustained, and the acts of the Legislature, to that extent, held to be null and void. And this House is now, for the first time, called upon to decide that in this respect a State Legislature may override and utterly disregard the provisions of the very constitution that brings it into being. I admit that if there was an irreconcilable antagonism between the Federal and State constitutions, in such case there would be ground for the position taken by the majority of the committee. But no such antagonism exists; therefore, call upon the House to pause long before they establish a precedent that will operate as an invitation to the State Legislatures to disregard those wholesome limitations which the people have attempted to place around the action of their own servants.

This long and undisturbed construction of their power to fix these limitations upon the action of their servants, placed upon the constitution by the people themselves, and by all departments of the Government, ought not at this late day to be disturbed, unless it is rendered absolutely necessary by the very terms of the Constitution itself.

This House has a record of its own, and has ever attempted to adhere to the construction placed by itself in former adjudicated cases upon the Constitution and laws. This is not a new question, as far as this House even is concerned. It is, indeed, res adjudicata. And we should not without very strong reasons, indeed, depart from the precedents established by ourselves. These precedents are all in favor of the construction which I have here placed upon this clause of the Constitution.

The case of Shiel vs. Thayer, in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, reported in Bartlett's Contested-Election Cases, page 349, is directly in point. The syllabus of the case says:

"The constitution of Oregon has fixed beyond the control of its Legislature the time for holding an election for Representatives in Congress."

The report in that case was made by the then and now able chairman of the Committee of Elections, Mr. DAWES, and the right of Mr. Shiel to the seat was placed distinctly on the ground that the people of Oregon held the right, in their constitution, to fix the time for the election of a member of Congress.

The contestant says the report is "of opinion that the election held for Representative in Congress on the first Monday in June, 1860, was held in pursuance of, and in conformity with, the constitution and laws of Oregon, and that consequently the contestant is entitled to the seat." And again: "Notwithstanding this constitutional provision that general elections shall be held on the first Monday of June biennially, the Legislature of Oregon seems to have believed that it had power to fix another time for the election of Representative in Congress."

"The committee have not deemed it necessary to determine what those reasons are for. With all due respect to the opinions of the gentlemen composing that Legislature, they are of opinion that this House must, nevertheless, be the final judge of the meaning of this clause of the constitution of Oregon. And, for the reason stated, the committee have no doubt that the constitution of the State has fixed beyond the control of the Legislature the time for holding an election for Representative in Congress, at the general election to be held biennially, and that at such election, so held in pursuance of the constitution, the contestant was duly elected." And again, in the debate in the House on this case, Mr. DAWES said, "It occurs to me, sir, that the provision of the Constitution of the United States which says that the time and place shall be specified by the Legislature of each State, meant simply that they should be fixed by the constituted authority of the State until Congress itself should fix a time for the election in all the States."

In the case of Farlee vs. Runk, in the Twenty-Ninth Congress, it was held that where there was a conflict between the State constitution and an act of the Legislature in regard to the place of voting for Representatives in Congress the provision of the constitution was binding, and the act of the Legislature, so far as it conflicted with it, was void. (See Bartlett's Contested-Election Cases, page 87.) And, without troubling this House with a further citation of authorities, I respectfully submit that the ruling of the House on this point has been uniform in every case in which the question arose.

But admitting that the Legislature was acting, and had the right to act, by virtue of this section four, article one, of the Federal Constitution, without regard to the State constitution, I still submit that all votes cast out of and beyond the State of Michigan were cast without any due, legal authority, and cannot properly be counted in determining the result of elections in that State, for the reason—

First, it seems to me plain that neither Congress nor the State Legislature can, under that clause of the Constitution, fix or prescribe any places of voting for any office outside of the district, and especially outside of the State, within and for which the officer is elected. If the construction of all powers granted, we must have reference to the object for which the power is given. At and before the adoption of the Constitution, and ever since, until within the last five years, all voters, everywhere in the United States, were required to vote within the district and State for which the officer is elected. At the time of the adoption of this clause, it is not easy to suppose that any one member of the Convention for one moment thought that they were granting to Congress the power to permit citizens to vote outside of the district and State for which the officers were to be elected. If the Legislature possesses this power, undoubtedly Congress possesses the same power. And if Congress possesses the power to prescribe places of voting outside of a district or State for a portion of its citizens, why not the power to prescribe places of voting outside of the State for all the citizens thereof? Why not prescribe that all the citizens of Michigan shall vote in Chicago for their members of Congress, and all the voters of Illinois go to St. Louis to vote for theirs? It may be said that this would be a gross abuse of power. But I deny the existence of any such power. And yet, if the power contended for by the committee exists, the other follows as a necessary consequence.

But the act of the Michigan Legislature (by virtue of which the votes were cast outside of the State) that it is proposed to count for the sitting member) does not prescribe the place or places of voting, and consequently the votes were not cast in pursuance of any competent authority. The provision of said statute is as follows:

"Sec. 7. At the elections herein provided for a poll shall be opened at every place, whether within or without the State, where a regiment, battalion, battery, or company of Michigan soldiers may be found or stationed, and at such election all persons may vote who are thereto entitled by law and by the provisions of this act."

Now, will any one pretend that that prescribes a place or places of election? What place or places? Would a law which provided that any elector of Michigan should vote at any place, within or without the State, where he might happen to be on the day of election, prescribe a place of voting? This is too clear. I submit with all deference, to admit of argument, if Congress or the Legislature can prescribe places of election outside of the State, I insist that the places must be named in the act; and that it is no compliance with the constitution to provide that a man, or a company of men, may vote at any place where they may happen to be on the day of election, and that such a law does not prescribe a place of election at all.

If the above positions, or any one of them, be correct, it follows that all votes cast for either Mr. Trowbridge or Mr. Baldwin outside of the State of Michigan were cast without any authority of law, and cannot properly be counted in making up the result, and, consequently, that Mr. Baldwin is entitled to the seat.

I therefore propose, as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee, the following:

Resolved, That Hon. Rowland E. Trowbridge is not entitled to hold the seat now occupied by him in this House as a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That Augustus C. Baldwin has been duly elected as a Representative from the State of Michigan to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and is entitled to a seat in this House.

S. S. MARSHALL.

Mr. BEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, the question before us is one in which the people of my State have felt some interest. Its presence here renders it in some degree of national concern; but it more especially affects the citizens of Michigan, particularly the thousands of brave men who lately so generously exposed their lives in the defense of our common country. I feel impelled, therefore, to state the reasons for the vote I am about to give; but in doing so, I shall study brevity, avoid declamation, and confine my observations strictly to the subject under discussion.

This question originated under an act of the Legislature of the State of Michigan, entitled "An act to enable the qualified electors of this State, in the military service, to vote at certain elections; and to amend sections forty-five and sixty-one of chapter six of the compiled laws," approved February 5, 1864.

By this act, familiarly known as the "soldiers' voting law," every qualified elector of the State in the military service of the United States, is authorized to vote at all elections, "whether at the time of voting he shall be within the limits of the State or not." I understand that by the stipulation under which this case is to be heard and determined, all questions of fraud or irregularity in the proceedings under the law are ignored, and therefore it seems unnecessary to look into the details of the act. The allegation of the contestant is, that the act itself is in conflict with the constitution of the State, and therefore void; and that the soldiers' vote, upon which the sitting member's right to his seat depends, must be rejected.

In support of this position section one of article seven of the constitution of the State of Michigan is cited, in which it is provided that—

"No citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector or entitled to vote at any election unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

It is insisted as the true construction of this section that it was intended to preclude every person from voting at any election at any place other than the township or ward in which he resides, and upon such construction the contestant's case chiefly depends. Yet whether or not this is the true interpretation of the provision cited I at this time express no opinion, because I do not deem it at all material to the question before us. It is proper, however, to say that different tribunals of the State, competent in their respective spheres of action to determine the question beyond the power of revision, have arrived at diverse conclusions. A majority of the supreme court have given the construction urged by the contestant, though the chief justice delivered a dissenting opinion, while both branches of the Legislature, in determining upon the election and qualification of their own members respectively, have pronounced decisions coinciding with the views of the chief justice. The case before us, however, is in no way affected except in a single particular, which I shall refer to hereafter, by the decisions and opinions to which I have alluded. This question must be decided upon entirely different principles.

Section one, article one, of the Constitution of the United States, vests the legislative power therein granted in a Congress, to consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

Section two of the same article provides for choosing the members of the House of Representatives and defines their qualifications.

The first clause of the fourth section is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, it is a fact worthy of notice, that the constitution of Michigan, though a very comprehensive instrument, embracing and treating upon almost every other imaginable subject, and possessing, in fact, many of the elements of a code, nevertheless, makes no allusion whatever to the creation, qualification, nature, or election of a Representative in Congress; nor is such an officer more than incidentally even referred to within all its very voluminous pages.

A Representative in Congress, then, is not a State officer. He is not a creature of the State, but of the national Government. The Legislature, in providing the times, places, and manner of elections of Representatives, does not derive its authority from the people of the State through their constitution, but from the Constitution of the United States. This delegation of power is not in terms conveyed through the people of the State, nor the constitution of the State, but it is conferred directly upon the Legislature. The power is not simply permissive, but mandatory; and it is of the most plenary character, subject only to the control of Congress. The soldiers' voting law, which is alleged to be unconstitutional, authorizes citizens of Michigan in the military service, absent from the State, but qualified electors, to vote for State and county officers and for members of the Legislature. It also empowers them to vote for Representatives in Congress. If the act is repugnant to the constitution of the State as it respects the places of election of State officers—a fact that I neither assert nor deny—then to that extent it is undoubtedly void. If it is framed in pursuance of and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States in regard to the election of Representatives in Congress, then to that extent it is just as clearly valid. In enacting the law in question, it will be observed that the Legislature acted in a twofold character, that is to say, as the law-making power of the State and as the agent of the United States. The Legislature was responsible for its doings in its respective capacities to two different principals—the will of the people of the State as determined by their constitution, and the Congress of the United States. It is not material that it attempted to execute both agencies in the same enactment. The one may be without sufficient warrant of authority, and the other authorized and valid. An entire statute will not be void on account of an unconstitutional provision, unless that provision is of such a nature that the remaining part of the act cannot be executed without it. Did the Legislature violate or exceed the instructions given by the people of the State? Then to that extent their action was clearly void, and all votes cast by absent citizens for members of the Legislature, State and county officers, should be rejected as illegal. Did the Constitution of the United States authorize that body to prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress? Then such legislation is not a subject for examination and control by the government of Michigan; and the Legislature is required to give an account of its stewardship to Congress alone. Did the constitution of Michigan prohibit an absent, patriotic, qualified elector from voting for Representatives in Congress? Then was such prohibition in conflict with the act of the Legislature, which had the authority, sanction, and command even of the Federal Constitution, and was absolutely null and void.

But, asks the contestant, "Are there no restrictions upon this exercise of power? Is there no control over State Legislatures?" Undoubtedly there are. The people by their fundamental law may restrain and control them in all matters within their jurisdiction, and by express provision of the Federal Constitution Congress may control the action of the Legislature in reference to the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives in Congress. But Michigan cannot control nor limit an express provision of the Constitution of the United States.

"The Legislatures," says the contestant, "are created by the people of the States, speaking through State constitutions, and are confined in the performance of their duties by the limitations of those instruments." Beyond all question they are created by the people of the States, "and undoubtedly they are speaking through," or by the authority of, "the State constitutions" when they declare the times, places, and manner of holding elections for State officers; but when they make enactments touching the election of Representatives in Congress, they are not speaking through State constitutions, nor are they "confined in the performance of their duties by the limitations of those instruments." So the judges of the State of New York are created by the people thereof, and their duties and powers are defined by the organic and statute laws of the State; but who will pretend that Congress could not authorize them to administer oaths and take testimony in cases of contested elections pending in this House, especially if there were an express provision of the Constitution of the United States charging such duties upon them? Nor can I agree with the contestant when he says, "The provision of the Constitution under consideration was never intended to confer powers upon a State Legislature in opposition to the constitution of the State." On the contrary, I am of the opinion that such was the precise, well-considered intention in framing that provision, or at least that it was intended to confer power upon the Legislature, subject to be regulated and controlled by Congress, that might be found to be in opposition to the constitution of the State. This is apparent from the latter part of the first clause of section four of article one: "But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators." Not only is the power withheld from the people of the State, but the right is reserved to control the action of the Legislature. Nor was this reservation of power the result of mere accident. It required no great degree of sagacity on the part of the framers of the Constitution to foresee the necessity and wisdom of such a precaution.

Inconveniences have already been felt, occasioned by the various times and manner, if not of the places, of holding elections for Representatives in Congress adopted in the several States; and more than once it has been suggested that Congress intervene to establish uniformity. The framers of our national Constitution having determined, as I have already said, that there should be a House of Representatives, it then became necessary, of course, to have elections of members. To that end there must be regulations touching the times, places, and manner of elections. To whom, or to what officers, persons, or bodies of men should these duties be confided? This question was not propounded to a constitutional convention of the State of Michigan. It was addressed to Washington and his compeers assembled in Convention at Philadelphia in 1777, and after due consideration, the answer was by them reduced to form and submitted to conventions of the several States, and it was ultimately decided before the State of Michigan had an existence, and placed beyond the control of State constitutions. These trusts might have been charged exclusively upon Congress. They might have been reposed in the Supreme Court of the United States. They might have been intrusted to the keeping of the supreme courts respectively of the several States. But the power was vested in the Legislatures of the several States, subject only to the control of Congress. And it was given to those bodies specifically eo nomine. Again, the duties of regulating the "times, places, and manner" might have been distributed among different persons, bodies, and officers. The power to determine the manner might have been given to the Legislatures, and that of assigning the times and places, with a view to uniformity, might have been reposed in the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Chief Justice is in no sense of the word a State officer. In the case supposed his authority comes directly from the Constitution of the United States. Would his action be void if it should happen to come in conflict with some State constitution? Again, the Governors of the States respectively, instead of the Chief Justice, might have been selected to determine "the times and places." In such case would a proclamation of the Governor for that purpose be invalid by reason of being repugnant to the constitution of his State? For that duty the State Executive would be ex officio an officer or agent of the United States. Does the adoption of a different agency diminish the national authority? In this regard the Legislature is no less the agent of the United States because it is the law-making power of the individual State.

Well, sir, the Legislature of Michigan having the legislative power of the State, subject to the checks and limitations imposed by the State constitution, and being also clothed with certain legislative authority by the Constitution of the United States, has enacted a law touching the election of State as well as Federal officers, and prescribing the places of election. Now, if this act runs counter to the State constitution, as to the election of State officers, it is void. But having the sanction of the Constitution of the United States, as to Federal officers, it is valid. This is a familiar principle of construction. Let us suppose that by the constitution of Michigan land is conveyed by deed, but that every deed or conveyance thereof acknowledged before a notary public is declared to be absolutely null and void; that by the laws of the State of New York any deed or conveyance of realty may be acknowledged before a notary public of any State in the Union. Suppose that A conveys to B, in and by the same deed, land in Detroit and land in Buffalo, and that the instrument of conveyance is duly acknowledged before a notary public of the Peninsular State—the deed may be void as to the land in Michigan, but does any one doubt that it will operate as a good conveyance of the land in the State of New York?

The construction that I have given to the first clause of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States is supported by the authorities. Indeed, I am not aware that any respectable writer or authority has ever doubted it, though I know that, at an early day, objections were made against the provision itself on the ground of policy.

Mr. Justice Story says (Story on the Constitution, volume two, section 813, page 280:)

"This clause does not appear to have attracted much attention or to have encountered much opposition in the Convention, at least so far as can be gathered from the journal of that body. But it was afterward assailed by the opponents of the Constitution, both in and out of the State conventions, with uncommon zeal and virulence. The objection was not to that part of the clause which vests in the State Legislatures the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections; for so far it was a surrender of power to the State governments. But it was to the superintending power of Congress to make or alter such regulations. It was said that such a superintending power would be dangerous to the liberties of the people and to a just exercise of their privileges in elections. Congress might prescribe the times of election so unreasonably as to prevent the attendance of the electors, or the place at so inconvenient a distance from the body of the electors as to prevent a due exercise of the right of choice. And Congress might contrive the manner of holding elections so as to exclude all but their own favorites from office."

"In answer to all such reasoning, it was urged that there was not a single article in the whole system more completely defensible. Its propriety rested upon this plain proposition, that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." * * * "There seemed but three ways in which it could be reasonably organized. It might be lodged either wholly in the national Legislature or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the Convention." —Section 814, p. 281.

I hope it is not necessary to make an elaborate argument in order to show that the framers of the national Constitution understood the import of the language employed by them in the construction of its various provisions. It would do great injustice to their intelligence and discrimination to suppose that when they used the word Legislature they intended to imply constitutional convention, or people of the State. In the distribution of the various grants of power they exercised nice discrimination; and in the use of terms they studied precision. Thus, by the first clause of section two, the members of the House of Representatives are to be "chosen every second year by the people of the several States." This provision would hardly warrant an election by the Legislature. By the fourth clause of the same section, "when vacancies happen in the representation from any State the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Could the Legislature issue such writs, or could the Executive be restrained from the discharge of that duty by a provision in the State constitution?

By the first clause of section three "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof;" and in the very next section (four) the Legislature is directed to prescribe the times, places, and manner of elections. In commenting upon the first clause of section three in reference to the appointment of Senators, Mr. Justice Story says:

"They are to be chosen by the Legislature of each State. Three schemes presented themselves as to the mode of appointment: one was by the Legislature of each State; another was by the people thereof; and a third was by the other branch of the national Legislature either directly or out of a select nomination." —Commentaries, vol. 2, sec. 701, p. 182.

Certainly, in these propositions, the people of the State, whether in or out of constitutional conventions, and the Legislature are not synonymous nor convertible terms. The different modes suggested for the election of Senators were presented as rival propositions, and the Convention was called upon to determine whether the power should be given to the Legislature or to the people of the State. In order that we may clearly understand the intention of the founders of the Government in regard to these propositions, I continue to quote from the same commentator. The last scheme—

"Met, however, with no decided support, and was negatived, no State voting in its favor, nine States voting against it, and one being divided. The second scheme, of an election by the people in districts or otherwise, seems to have met with as little favor. The first scheme, that of an election by the Legislature, finally prevailed by a unanimous vote."

Now, I think I have shown that in section three the word "Legislature" does not mean State nor the people of a State. Has it a different or more comprehensive signification in section four? Again says Mr. Justice Story:

"Another question might be suggested, whether the Executive constitutes a part of the Legislature for such a purpose in cases where the State constitution gives him a qualified negative upon the laws. But this has been silently and universally settled against the executive participation in the appointment." —Section 703, p. 184.

These references to the national Constitution and the opinions of statesmen contemporary with its formation, show that when its framers used the word Legislature they meant by that term precisely what it imports. It was employed in no latitudinarian sense. They carefully distinguished the Legislature from the Executive and from the people. They did not comprehend under the term Legislature the entire government of the State. For that purpose they selected a more fit and comprehensive word. Thus we find them declaring that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit," &c.; that "no State shall enter into any treaty," &c.; that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any impost or duties," &c.; and that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty on tonnage," &c.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is intimated that section four is limited and controlled by section two of article one of the Federal Constitution, wherein it is provided that "the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature," and that soldiers absent from the State are not qualified electors.

The qualifications of electors are prescribed in section one, article seven, of the State constitution, a part of which I have already quoted, but I will now read the entire section:

"Sec. 1. In all elections, every white male citizen, every white male inhabitant residing in the State on the 24th day of June, 1835; every white male inhabitant residing in the State on the 1st day of January, 1850, who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, pursuant to the laws thereof, six months preceding an election, or who has resided in this State two years and six months, and declared his intentions aforesaid, and every civilized male inhabitant of Indian descent, a native of the United States, and not a member of any tribe, shall be an elector and entitled to vote; but no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector, or entitled to vote at any election, unless he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, and has resided in the State three months, and in the township or ward in which he offers to vote ten days next preceding such election."

Now, at this stage of the argument, in order to avoid confusion, it is important that we keep the two points of discussion, for there are two, separate and distinct. Let me be explicit. The first is, can the Legislature, without regard to the State constitution, but subject to alteration and control by Congress, determine the times, places, and manner of elections for Representatives in Congress? This I have already considered. The second is, conceding that the qualifications of electors may be prescribed by the State constitution, has the Legislature by their enactment attempted to dispense with any qualifications required by that instrument? If we bear this distinction in mind, and if I am right in regard to the first point, we shall see that whether or not there is repugnancy apparent or real between the organic law of the State and the act of the Legislature, as it respects the place of voting, is of no consequence whatever unless the place shall be found to be an element of the qualification of the election.

But our attention is specially called to that part of section one in which it is declared that "no citizen or inhabitant shall be an elector or entitled to vote," &c. And it is insisted, as the fair construction of this section, that the ballot must actually be deposited by the elector in the township or ward wherein he resides; and that the offering to vote in the township or ward is a part of the qualification of the elector; but that by the act of the Legislature the elector may vote outside of his township or ward, in fact out of the State. Now, this may be an ingenious mode of stating the proposition, but disguise it as you may it is but a reproduction of the first objection by the employment of other language to express the same idea. The objection, in substance, in whatever words it may be couched, goes to the place of voting, and not to the qualification of the elector. There is no conflict between the soldiers' voting law and section one of article seven of the State constitution in the particular of qualification. Indeed, the act itself, in express terms, limits the franchise to "qualified electors." There is no complaint made on the ground of citizenship or age or sex or color. There is no question of residence made. Indeed, there could be none, because section five, article seven, of the State constitution expressly provides that "no elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his being employed in the service of the United States." I repeat, the objection respects the place of voting and not the qualification of the elector. Clearly the words "in the township or ward in which he offers to vote" are not words of qualification as pertaining to the competency of the elector. It would be a solecism to say that the act of depositing the ballot is a prerequisite element of qualification which must precede the act itself; that is to say, that the man is not and cannot be qualified to offer to vote until he has actually offered to vote. Suppose a white male citizen twenty-one years of age has resided in the first ward of the city of Detroit for three months next preceding the day of election, and is on that day actually present in his ward at the poll with his ballot in his hand, is he a qualified elector within the meaning of the constitution? Suppose he retires without offering his vote, is he any the less a qualified elector? Must he vote before he can be qualified to vote? Must he offer to vote in order to acquire those qualifications which alone will justify him in attempting to vote? The contestant falls into the extraordinary error of asserting that no citizen of Michigan can be a qualified elector until he has offered to vote in his township or ward, yet nothing can be more logical than the proposition that no citizen can legally and properly offer to exercise the elective franchise who is not already a duly qualified elector. Then is it not clear that the words "offers to vote" are not words of qualification, but that they are a limitation as to the place where the act is to be performed? If doubts still exist, I think they may be dispelled by reference to other provisions of the State constitution. Words of doubtful import in one section may be rendered certain by other parts of the same statute. In order to determine the meaning of a statute or other legal instrument all its parts should be construed together. Then let the constitution become its own expounder. Thus, section three, article seven:

"Every elector in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during his attendance at election and in going to and returning from the same."

What is to be understood by the term elector as here used? Certainly it does not mean a citizen who has offered to vote in his township or ward, because he is exempt from arrest while going to the place of election. The contestant's theory would furnish an impertinent official a convenient defense to a prosecution for the illegal arrest of an elector on his way to the poll. It would be sufficient to show that the party alleged to be injured had not offered to vote, and therefore was not an elector.

"Sec. 4. No elector shall be obliged to do militia duty on the day of election except in times of war or public danger, or attend court as a suitor or witness."

Here, evidently, the person intended is one who, though absent from the poll, is a qualified elector; otherwise, the term citizen or other word of like import would have been employed instead of the one adopted.

And again:

"Sec. 5. No elector shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his being employed in the service of the United States."

This section recognizes the very class of men whom the contestant would disfranchise, designates them by the word electors, and saves their residence: though at the same time they are without the State resisting the assaults of traitors. Of course, if they are electors at all, they are qualified electors.

But I return to section one, article seven. And here I suggest that whatever may be the construction of the constitution of Michigan in regard to the locality of elections, considered in and by itself alone, it cannot be fairly so construed as to apply to the election of Federal officers, nor as to establish any element of qualification inconsistent with the requirements of the Federal Government. In the creation of that instrument, what was the prominent idea that occupied the minds of its framers and of the people who adopted it? The constitution of Michigan is the framework of a State government. It declares by what officers and machinery the government shall be organized and conducted, defines the powers and duties of many of the officers, and also prescribes the places of their election and the qualification of the electors. But it utters not a single word in reference to the election of Representatives in Congress; and it cannot be presumed that it was intended in any way to conflict with the Federal Constitution. The main purpose that occupied the minds of the framers of the State constitution touching elections, the only purpose in that regard by them specially expressed, was to regulate elections for officers of their own State. But admit, for sake of the argument, that section one, article seven, is broad enough in its terms to embrace all elections within the State, and for all officers, State as well as national, and that it has prescribed the qualifications of electors, which it could do, and the place of voting, which it could not do; what then? Why, the United States accepts and adopts the prescribed qualifications, but rejects the provision as it regards the locality of voting. But yet the Federal authority does not assume to interfere with the local affairs of the State. Michigan has sent to the field during the war over eighty thousand men, a large portion of whom were legal voters. It is conceded that in the exercise of her discretion she may deny to her loyal sons and gallant defenders the sacred privilege of joining with their fellow-citizens at home in the selection of their State and county officers. If such be the construction of her organic law, just or unjust, expedient or impolitic, that is a matter of her own concern. But then the Legislature comes to their aid, and clothed with a higher, or, if you please, with an independent authority, declares that those heroic, qualified electors—qualified by their State constitution—shall be permitted to vote for Representatives in Congress, and by that means to aid in the maintenance of an Administration that will take care that the fruits of their expensive victories shall be preserved for the benefit of themselves and their posterity.

I think I have shown that by the terms of the State constitution the place of voting was not intended to constitute a part of the qualification of the elector. But I go further, and insist that whatever might have been their object, it was not in the power of the people of the State to make it a qualification. Had the State constitution been free from all uncertainty, and declared in unmistakable terms that "in no case whatever shall any person vote outside of his township or ward," and further declared that "the place of voting shall be taken and held to be an indispensable requisite of the qualification of the elector," yet such words in fact and in law would create no qualification as applicable to a voter for Representative in Congress. Why? Because such a limitation or restraint as against the Constitution of the United States would be void. That instrument has, in effect, prohibited the people of the State from designating in their constitution the places of holding elections for Representatives by conferring that power upon the Legislature, and they cannot evade that inhibition by converting the place of voting into an element of qualification. Commanding the Legislature to prescribe the places, subject to the control of Congress, is equivalent to a declaration that the people shall not inter-
